96. Deppe v. General Motors Corp., 15 F. (2d) 419; Alliance Se-confirmed by what the patentee said when he was making his application.[97] Mere remarks by the examiner in the course of the proceedings do not estop the patentee from claiming the construction shown by the specification and original claim.[98]

Construction contemplated by patent office. Where it is in evidence from the record of the patent office that a certain construction was there contemplated, and that the patent would not otherwise have been granted, that construction will be followed,[99] and no objection can be made to the same construction on the ground that it is narrow, and will render the patent practically useless.[1] But an interpretation by the patent authorities extending claims beyond their proper import is not binding on the public.[2]

Formal admissions imposed upon applicant as a condition precedent to the allowance of a patent are binding.[3]

[§ 342] 8. Other Patents or Applications Therefor. Two patents cannot be read together to make up a claim.[4] Where a patent expressly refers to another patent, such other patent may be read to ascertain the true intent and construction to be placed on the patent making the reference.[5] Other patents relating to the same subject matter and designed to protect part of the same discovery may also be considered.[6] Where different applications by a patentee and interference proceedings relating to the same subject matter are pending at the same time, all may be considered in determining the construction of the patent, as granted,[7] but it is not proper to interpret an issued patent to extend its scope in the light of a copending application referred to in the patent which application has not ripened into a patent.[8]

Where an inventor divides up his invention so as to present certain elements in different patents, he is thereby limited to a more strict and narrow construction than might have been otherwise necessary.[9]

[a] Application of rule.—Where a patent was granted on the contention and argument of applicant that his device was distinguished from prior reference in a certain particular, he cannot insist that such feature is immaterial to establish infringement. Grever v. U. S. Hoffman Co., 202 Fed. 923, 121 CCA 281.

[b] As disclaimer.—Representations made to secure patents operate as disclaimers, and are binding on patentee. Lektophone Corp. v. Rola Co., 27 F. (2d) 758.

[c] Settled rule of construction.—When the patent office has a settled rule of construction under which a certain phrase in a patent grant has a fixed meaning, acquiesced in by the patentee, the courts cannot afterward rightfully say that the phrase means something more or something less. National Tube Co. v. Mark, 216 Fed. 507, 133 CCA 13.

[a] Where the patent is not for a broad invention but merely for a change of form, admissions contained in a file wrapper and its contents in respect of amendments made upon the citation of references involving the issue of novelty constitute an estoppel against the patentee in the interpretation of his claims. Richardson v. American Pin Co., 73 Fed. 476.

[b] Disclaimer as admission of priority of noninterfering claims in copending application.—Where the owner of a pending application on notice of interference with a particular claim of a copending application disclaimed as to it, and erased part of his application relating thereto, the patent office, in declaring interference, as to one claim only, in effect ruled that there was no interference between other claims of the copending application, and applicant's course of conduct in disclaiming as to the one claim only was in effect a formal admission, with concurrence and approval of the patent office, that the copending application was entitled to priority as to claims as to which no interference was declared. Weaver, Inc. v. American Chain Co., 9 F. (2d) 372 [mod 1 F. (2d) 590 (certiorari den 273 U. S. 699 mem, 47 SCt 94 mem, 71 L. ed. 847 mem)].

[a] Patent expressly for improvement (1) on the device of a prior patent to the same inventor should be read in connection with the first, and will not be declared void because, standing alone, it does not describe an operative apparatus. Los Alamitos Sugar Co. v. Carroll, 173 Fed. 280, 97 CCA 446. (2) The rule that a claim which is broader than the described invention is void is not applicable in its full force where the patent is for an improvement on the device of an earlier patent to the same patentee. [b] Where process and product patent were the result of a division, the product patent may be examined to ascertain the scope of invention of the process patent. Bestwall Mfg. Co. v. U. S. Gypsum Co., 270 Fed. 542 [aff 258 Fed. 647].

construed in the light of the state of the art at the time it was granted,[10] and the patentee is entitled only to the benefit of such forward movement in the art as has resulted from the particular patent in suit.[11] When they can see that there has been a new discovery of great benefit to the art, courts are liberal in the interpretation of disclosures and claims,[12] but where there has been only a slight step forward, the patent, if sustained, will be given a narrow scope.[13] Where a patent was in art which was new, and some of its definitions and phraseology were in the making, courts should not be astute to find obstacles against the inventor,[14] but the courts must also be vigilant to prevent endeavors on the part of the patentee to utilize after-acquired knowledge.[15]

Evidence. Although evidence of prior patents and prior use is not competent to show the invalidity of the patent on which a suit for infringement is brought, unless the matter is set up in the answer and the required notice is given,[16] it is nevertheless admissible for the purpose of construing the patent.[17] It has been very generally held that in re-

[b] Recitals of the prior art (1) in the specification of a patent can no more be taken as conclusive to negative novelty and invention than the claims of novelty and invention therein to establish the same. Mead Morrison Mfg. Co. v. Exeter Mach. Works, 196 Fed. 789. (2) In an infringement suit involving a patent for an abrasive compound, clear statements in the patent that grinding mixtures employing oil as an ingredient were known to the art, and that the improvement claimed was a change from oil to starch, were properly to be considered on question of validity. Zip Mfg. Co. v. Pusch, 2 F. (2d) 828.

[c] Related patents issued to patentee as well as others must be considered to ascertain the effect on the art of the patent in suit. Haynes Stellite Co. v. Chesterfield, 8 F.(2d) 765.

[d] Prior patents showing separate elements.—Although all of the elements of a patented combination are not found in a single structure in the prior art, so as fully to anticipate, in determining the scope of the patent and its place in the art, as affecting the question of infringement, prior patents, showing separate elements of the combination, may properly be considered. Ventilated Cushion, etc., Co. v. D'Arcy, 232 Fed. 468, 146 CCA 462.

[e] Adaptability to phase of art.—Where an inventor has placed his invention generally and specifically in the printing machine art, the fact that it is especially adapted to the lithographic phase of that art is not important except in so far as the problems peculiar to that application may assist in determining the question of invention. Scott v. Harris Automatic Press Co., 284 Fed. 778.

17. Zip Mfg. Co. v. Pusch, 2 F. (2d) 828.

spect of the state of the art the court may take judicial notice of matters of common knowledge.[18]

[§ 344] 10. Success or Nonuse of Patent. The fact that a patent has become a great commercial success is a reason for according it a liberality of construction;[19] but the rule is not so applicable where the success of the patent is accounted for on other grounds than its utility.[20] While the validity of a patent is not affected by nonuse,[21] it is ground for giving it a strict or narrow construction.[22]

[§ 345] 11. Construction Where Patent Assigned. As between an assignor and assignee, a patent should be liberally construed.[23] However, the assignor is not precluded from contending for as narrow a construction of the language as the claims would warrant and the conditions of the prior art might require,[24] but the courts will not unnecessarily construe it so narrowly as to make it worthless,[25] as the assignor is estopped to deny its validity.[26] The fact that complainant, before acquiring the patent which it claimed was infringed, gave it a narrow construction does not estop him from asserting a broader construction after acquisition, and claiming defendant's infringement.[27]

[§ 346] 12. Opinion of Experts. It is only where a court requires the explanation of technical terms or the language of any particular art to enable it to understand the specification of a patent that the testimony of those expert in the art is pertinent.[28] The question whether the judge needs the assistance of experts is for him to decide.[29] The court is not bound by the opinions of experts and may reject them where they do not seem reasonable.[30]

[§ 347] 13. Patent as Notice. Everyone is bound to take notice of a patent, since the record thereof in the patent office is legal notice to all the world.[31]

[§ 348] 14. Questions for Court and Jury. In conformity with general rules[32] the scope and meaning of a patent is a matter of law for the court, and the application of the law to the facts of the case is for the jury.[33] It is for the court to construe the patent and instruct the jury as to its meaning.[34] Where there is parol evidence as to the meaning of terms, the question may be submitted to the jury.[35]

[§ 349] B. Claims—1. In General. The protection furnished by a patent is measured by what is set forth in the claims.[36] Everything not covered by

used must be so construed where possible to sustain the patent and protect the real invention,[39] limitations not stated in a claim will not be read into a claim for the purpose of making out a case of novelty or infringement.[40]

When broad construction given. The claims of a patent will be given a broad construction in accordance with their terms,[41] unless limitations are written therein,[42] or imposed by the prior art[43] or by the acceptance of patent office rulings.[44] Where an invention is substantial and meritorious, a claim should not be strictly interpreted and limited.[45]

When strict or narrow construction given. Claims will be given a strict construction when they are narrow[46] and the art is crowded.[47] Where possible, claims will be restricted to save the patent.[48] A structed to meet subsequent conditions and new facts subsequently discovered, but the patentee must abide by his specifications and claims. Siemund v. Enderlin, 212 Fed. 410, 129 CCA 604 [aff 206 Fed. 283].

[a] A strict construction should not be resorted to, if the result would be a limitation on the actual invention, unless it is required by the language of the claim. Wagner Typewriter Co. v. Wyckoff, 151 Fed. 585, 81 CCA 129 [mod 138 Fed. 108].

[b] Rule applied.—A claim in a patent of "rotatably mounted bars . . . substantially as described" as an element of a combination is not void because the specification and drawings show a rotatable and a fixed bar, there being no doubt as to the thing intended. Maunula v. Sunell, 155 Fed. 535.

[c] "Means" or "mechanism" as element.—A claim of a patent is not functional and invalid merely because one of its specified elements is "means" or "mechanism." Remington Cash Register Co. v. [a] For example (1) where one element in the claim for an automatic tank heat regulator was a "conduit," which means a channel, including a tube or pipe, for the conveyance of fluids, it cannot be construed to mean a long-cooled conduit, to avoid invalidity in view of defendant's prior machine, and to show infringement by defendant's subsequent machine in which the conduit was lengthened. Fulton Co. v. Powers Regulator Co., 263 Fed. 578. (2) A claim calling in general terms for a "noncombustible and nonconducting material" cannot be limited by construction to a particular noncombustible, nonconducting material named in the specification, either to avoid anticipation or infringement. Empire Circuit Co. v. Channon, 168 Fed. 705, 94 CCA 211.

[a] Ambiguity as to given element.—In construing a claim in that respect ambiguous, a given element should be implied if its presence was necessary to distinguish from the prior art or from the other claims; otherwise, it should not operate as a limitation. Wm. B. Scaife, etc., Co. v. Falls City Woolen Mills, 209 Fed. 210, 126 CCA 304 [rev 194 Fed. 139].

Lacey, 200 Fed. 966; Comptograph Co. v. Adder Mach. Co., 41 App. (D. C.) 427.

[a] Anticipation viewed from same point as infringement.—Where the broader view of a claim is necessary to make out infringement, the proof of anticipation must be considered from the same point of view. Wm. B. Scaife, etc., Co. v. Falls City Woolen Mills, 209 Fed. 210, 126 CCA 304 [rev 194 Fed. 139].

[b] Limits of doctrine.—(1) The terms and expressions of a narrow claim should not necessarily be limited to a hard and fast unbending definition. Sanitary Refrigerator Co. v. Winters, 24 F. (2d) 15 [certiorari den 49 SCt 8 mem, and certiorari granted 49 SCt 17 mem]. (2) Limiting words, relied on in the patent office to differentiate a patent from a prior patent, when developing ambiguity should not be read any more broadly than is reasonably necessary to serve such purpose of differentiation. needless multiplicity of claims calls for a limited construction of them.[49]

[§ 350] 2. Claims Construed by Specifications. The claims of a patent must be determined in the light of the specifications[50] and drawings,[51] as the privilege of the patentee covers only what is de-

[a] When rule not applicable.—Where claims employ broad and nebulous terms for the apparent purpose of enabling the patentee to monopolize an important industry, the claims will not be narrowed beyond the boundaries clearly warranted by the specification. Co., 145 Fed. 923, 76 CCA 461 [aff 142 Fed. 221] (where language is doubtful or ambiguous). And see Fowler, etc., Mfg. Co. v. National Radiator Co., 172 Fed. 661, 97 CCA 187 (to ascertain the meaning of nontechnical terms).

[a] Necessity for rule.—No patented invention can be practically or fairly understood or explained if the language of the claims is entirely dissociated from the specification, and the claims and specification should be read together. Nineteen Hundred Washer Co. v. Cramer, 169 Fed. 629, 95 CCA 157 [aff 163 Fed. 296].

[b] Significance attached to terms by description.—The court is justified, when the intention is clear, in giving to modifying words and phrases a significance ascertainable only by reference to the description. Filer, etc., Co. v. Diamond Iron Works, 250 Fed. 454, 162 CCA 524 [aff 241 Fed. 498, and certiorari den 246 U. S. 676 mem, 38 SCt 426 mem, 62 L. ed. 933 mem].

[c] Disclosure presenting trivial advance.—Where disclosure of the specification presents only a trivial variation over the prior art, the patentee should be literally confined to the detail he presents. Ham Boiler Corp. v. Hugo, 23 F. (2d) 163.

[d] Notwithstanding presumption that broader claims were intended to cover equivalent forms of construction, where other and narrower claims fully covered the construction described in the specifications, the broad claims must be read with the description of the invention, in order to determine the scope and effect that should be given to them. Troy Wagon Works Co. v. Ohio Tailer Co., 272 Fed. 850.

[e] That additional method impossible of attainment is set out in the specification does not prevent protection for the results accomplished. French v. Buckeye Iron, etc., Works, 10 F. (2d) 257 [certiorari den 271 U. S. 673 mem, 46 SCt 486 mem, 70 L. ed. 1144 mem].

[f] Claims lacking in the clearness and definiteness required by statute cannot be made good by reference to the specification. North American Chemical Co. v. Keno Supply Co., 227 Fed. 63, 141 CCA 611.

[g] Manifest clerical errors in the claims of a patent may be corrected by reference to the specification and drawings. American Bank Protection Co. v. Johnson City Nat. Bank, 181 Fed. 375.

[h] Provisional specification cannot be used to enlarge the meaning of the complete specification. Mackelcan v. Rennie, 13 C. B. N. S. 52, 106 ECL 52, 143 Reprint 21.

51. Buckeye Blower Co. v. Arensscribed and claimed.[52] Specific reference in the claim to the specification is not necessary in order to warrant its consideration.[53] While the claims may be explained and illustrated by the specification,[54] they cannot be enlarged thereby;[55] it has also been said that they cannot be changed thereby.[56] It is generally held, however, that the claims may be limited by the specifications,[57] at least in case of am-

Co., 145 Fed. 923, 76 CCA 461 [aff 142 Fed. 221] (where language is doubtful or ambiguous).

[a] Invention is not to be ascertained from drawings alone.—General Electric Co. v. Dunkirk, 211 Fed. 658 [aff 211 Fed. 657, 128 CCA 575].

[b] Cuts cannot be used to contradict the plain language of the claims. McMillan v. Fischer Auto Bed, etc., Co., 264 Fed. 671.

[c] Supplying feature not described.—Drawings cannot supply the absence of any written description of a feature of the invention. Davis-Bournonville Co. v. Alexander Milburn Co., 297 Fed. 846 [aff 1 F. (2d) 227 (certiorari granted 266 U. S. 596 mem, 45 SCt 93 mem, 69 L. ed. 459 mem, and rev on other grounds 270 U. [d] Variance between drawings and specifications.—There cannot be a substantial variance between the drawings and specifications, but the specifications usually govern. Carson Inv. Co. v. Anaconda Copper Min. Co., 26 F. (2d) 651 [rev 17 F. (2d) 815, and certiorari den 49 SCt 32 mem].

[e] Patent should not be restricted to precise form shown in drawing. Westinghouse Electric, etc., Co. v. Royal-Eastern Electrical Supply Co., 9 F. (2d) 397.

[f] Drawings not made to scale.—The drawings of a patent are often diagrammatic and not drawn to a scale, and a patented device is not to be held inoperative merely because a slavish adherence to the drawings develops obstacles, which may in many cases be overcome by the exercise of common sense and ordinary mechanical skill. Manhattan Book Casing Mach. Co. v. E. C. Fuller Co., 204 Fed. 286, 122 CCA 440.

[g] Mistake (1) in the illustration did not limit the claim sought to be illustrated. Van Meter v. Irving Air Chute Co., 27 F. (2d) 170. (2) That a drawing of a patent, through an error of the draftsman, shows a construction evidently not contemplated nor claimed by the inventor does not give the patent effect as an anticipation of a subsequent patent in that particular. Kryptok Co. v. Stead Lens Co., 207 Fed. 85 [aff 214 Fed. 368, 131 CCA 144].

[a] Where a change or function is neither described nor claimed, and especially where other changes are described and insisted on as essential and specifically claimed, it is significant proof that the change which has not been disclosed by him to the public is not his invention. Electric Storage Battery Co. v. Gould Storage Battery Co., 158 Fed. 610, 85 CCA 432 [aff 148 Fed. 695].

[b] Claim for result or means.—(1) The general term "means," used in a patent claim, will not include all means which can perform the same function, but only those which are shown in the patent and their mechanical equivalents. Henry v. Los Angeles, 225 Fed. 769, 167 CCA 113 [aff 230 Fed. 457]; General Electric Co. v. Sundh Electric Co., 251 Fed. 283. (2) A patentee by claiming a patent on result or function of a machine may not extend his patent to devices or mechanisms not described. Holland Furniture Co. v. Perkins Glue Co., 277 U. S. 245, 48 SCt 474, 72 L. ed. 868 [rev 18 F. (2d) 387].

Reading element described into claim. If a claim includes an element in general terms and refers to the specifications to identify it, such element may be read into the claim.[59] It has been asserted without qualification that an essential element described and shown in the specifications and drawings may be read into a claim, although not specified therein.[60] It has also been asserted that this cannot be done.[61] It has been held that an essential element described and shown by the specification and drawings may be read into the claim for the purpose of making the claim describe an operative method or device,[62] but not for the purpose of making out a case of novelty or infringement.[63]

Effect of disclaimer in specification.[64] A patentee cannot claim that which he has disclaimed in his specifications.[65]

[§ 351] 3. Effect of Words "Substantially as Described" in Claim. Such words as "substantially as described" placed at the end of a claim do not have the effect of limiting the claim to precisely what is described and shown,[66] but mean merely that the specification and drawings are to be looked to in determining the meaning and scope of the terms used.[67] The words do limit the claim if necessary to sustain it or to cover the real invention,[68] but they cannot extend the patent beyond the claim which bounds the patentee's rights.[69] They are implied in all claims whether they are actually present

[a] Effect.—The general language in a claim for a patent, which points to an element or device more fully described in the specifications and drawings of which it is a part, is limited to such an element as is there described. Royal Co. v. Tweedie, 276 Fed. 351 [rev 267 Fed. 224]; Ottumwa Box Car Loader Co. v. Christy Box Car Loader Co., 215 Fed. 362, 131 CCA 504.

65. Manton-Gaulin Mfg. Co. v. Wright-Ziegler Co., 271 Fed. 391.

[a] Extent of rule.—When necessary to construe a claim limitation to determine the question of infringement, a specification disclaimer of an older patent will not control the claim limitation unless the respect in which defendant's device differs from the patent is the same respect in which the patent differs from the reference. [a] Use of words in connection with call for means.—Where the claims of a patent specify the elements of a combination, but do not specify the means whereby those elements perform their functions but call for "means" generally, and close with the words "substantially as and for the purpose" described, or specified, or set forth, such words import into the claims the specific means described in the specification, and the claims are limited accordingly. [§ 352] 4. Reference Letters. The use in the claims of letters of reference appearing in the drawing as representing parts of the apparatus is not to be regarded as limiting the claim to the precise form of those parts unless such limitation is necessary in order to make the claim patentable over the prior art.[71]

[§ 353] 5. Advantages, Uses, or Forms of Invention. Unless the patentee has foregone a part of his right by limitations in his claims,[72] he is entitled to every advantage inherent in the invention,[73] all its fairly disclosed possibilities,[74] every form in which the invention may be copied[75]—unless form is essential to the invention[76]—all the uses to which it can be applied,[77] all the properties of the discov-

[a] Rule applied.—The use in a claim of a patent of a letter of reference to the drawings which show a part composed of two pieces does not limit the patentee to a two-piece construction where it is not of the essence of the invention claimed. Brunswick-Balke-Collender Co. v. Rosatto, 159 Fed. 729 [aff 165 Fed. 56, 91 CCA 142].

[b] Improvements of narrow character.—The use of letters in a claim to describe a patented invention, which is merely an improvement of a narrow character, will limit the inventor to the elements so designated, as shown in the drawings and specifications to which the letters refer, which are by such reference, in effect, incorporated in the claim. Ross-Moyer Mfg. Co. v. Randall, 104 Fed. 355, 43 CCA 578 [foll Washburne v. Consolidated Safety Pin Co., 197 Fed. 552].

[c] Distinction between claims.—Where reference letters form the only distinction between two claims, they indicate a narrower scope. Curry v. Union Electric Welding Co., 230 Fed. 422, 144 CCA 564 [aff 279 Fed. 465 (certiorari den 260 U. S. 727 mem, 43 SCt 89 mem, 67 L. ed. 484 mem)].

[a] Feature not necessarily inherent.—Where an alleged element or characteristic feature of an invention is not necessarily inherent in the invention itself, the failure of the patentee to refer to it is persuasive evidence that it is not within the scope of his invention, and, not being disclosed to the public, it should not be read into the patent. "The patentee, having described his invention and shown its principles, and claimed it in that form which most perfectly embodies it, is, in contemplation of law, deemed to claim every form in which his invention may be copied, unless he manifests an intention to disclaim some of these forms." Western Electric Co. v. La Rue, 139 U. S. 601, 606, 11 SCt 670, 35 L. ed. 294.

[a] Statutory requirement that an applicant for a patent shall explain the best mode in which he has contemplated applying the principle of his invention (U. S. Rev. St. § 4888) does not preclude him from claiming any other mode which embodies his principle. Vrooman v. Penhollow, 179 Fed. 296, 102 CCA 484 [reh den 186 Fed. 495, 108 CCA 502]; J. L. Owens Co. v. [a] Rule applied.—Where a patented pump was designed primarily for use as an air pump, the fact that it may also be used as a combined air and water pump, or as a water pump, and that such uses are claimed, does not deprive the patentee, in determining the invention, of the ery,[78] or the benefit of every function possessed by his mechanism.[79] It is immaterial that the particular benefits to which the patentee is entitled are not mentioned or specified[80] or claimed,[81] or that the inventor was or was not aware of them.[82]

[§ 354] 6. Equivalents. A patentee is entitled to hold as infringer not merely one who makes or uses a device having the specific elements disclosed and claimed by him, but anyone who makes or uses a device having elements which are known equivalents of those claimed.[83] The things, however, must be known equivalent of each other at the time of the patent.[84] What is regarded as an equivalent depends upon the circumstances of the particular

[a] Definition.—"Equivalents" in an art or process are such acts as, in accordance with the rules of construction relating to patents, are interchangeable with those which the inventor has himself employed. Superior Skylight Co. v. August Kuhnla, Inc., 265 Fed. 282 [aff 273 Fed. 482].

[b] Otherwise stated.—Although an inventor is not confined to the exact details of his disclosure, the extent of his contribution is limited to such substitutes for any disclosed element as the art needs no help to find. H. Ward Leonard, Inc. v. Maxwell Motor Sales Corp., 252 Fed. 584, 164 CCA 659 [rev 288 Fed. 62].

[c] Patentee is not confined to equivalents named in his specification. Treibacher-Chemische Werke Gesellschaft v. Roessler, etc., Chemical Co., 219 Fed. 210, 135 CCA 108 [aff 214 Fed. 410].

[d] Describing two forms of element.—The fact that the specification of a patent describes two forms of one element of the combination which may be used in the alternative, while a claim describes but one of such forms, does not preclude the patentee from invoking the doctrine of equivalents as to the alternative form. Whitin Mach. Works v. Houghton, 178 Fed. 444, 101 CCA 344.

[e] Patent for prescribed means or mechanism to accomplish a desired end must be limited to the particular means described in the specification, or their clear mechanical equivalents, and does not cover any other mechanical structure which is substantially different in its construction or in its operation. Dudlo Mfg. Co. v. Varley Duplex Magnet Co., 253 Fed. 745, 165 CCA 339; Union Match Co. v. Diamond Match Co., 162 Fed. 148, 89 CCA 172.

[f] Examples of equivalents.—(1) A call for a "one-piece integral" part has been construed to include one made integral by the permanent holding together of the parts and their integral operation or function. Goldsmith Co. v. Johnstone, 294 Fed. 756. (2) U bar may be claimed as the equivalent of an angle bar, where form is immaterial to the invention. Lutton Co. v. Lord, etc., Co., 16 F. (2d) 490 [aff 19 F. (2d) 1023]. (3) A patent for a revolving door, whose wings are "automatically unlocked" by an unusual pressure, was held to cover a structure in which the wings are held together by chains which will break with an unusual pressure. Van Kannel Revolving Door Co. v. Straus, 235 Fed. 135, 148 CCA 629. (4) Although a patent for a furnace arch illustrated only a straight roofed arch, a hipped arch was within its range of protection where the construction of such arch involved only the use of a bracket having the angle of attachment modified by a mere difference in forging or by the use of shims. Laclede Christy Clay Products Co. v. St. Louis, 270 Fed. 338 [aff 280 Fed. 83].

case,[85] the patentee being entitled to a range of equivalents commensurate with the novelty exhibited.[86] What in the prior art is differentiated from the patent to give it validity cannot be claimed as an equivalency for the purpose of establishing infringement.[87]

Effect of limitations in claims. The fact that the claims in a patent are limited in scope does not deprive them of all the benefits of the doctrine of equivalency, if those benefits are availed of in a manner commensurate with the scope of the invention, and without doing violence to the language of the claims.[88] The rules that an express limitation may not be disregarded,[89] and that a form equivalent to a specified form infringes,[90] often seem to come into conflict.[91] Thus it is broadly stated that an expressly stated limitation cannot be overcome by the doctrine of equivalents,[92] and on the other hand it is said that a patentee is not to be so strictly limited to the language of his claims as to nullify the doctrine of equivalents.[93] There is no fixed formula by which the conflict can be settled.[94] It has been variously said that the conflict must be determined by finding the true meaning of "equivalency" in the case to be decided,[95] and that the question is how far the patentee intended to restrict the range of equivalents.[96] The true distinction appears to be that, when a word of limitation in a claim represents a thought essential to that which the inventor regarded as his new step, its limiting effect cannot be neutralized through the rule of equivalents;[97] and where the limitation does not pertain to the inventive step, but is rather an adoption of the invention to its environment,[98] or pertains to an accessory of the substantial invention, the doctrine of equivalents may be applied.[99]

[§ 355] 7. Pioneer Inventions. A pioneer invention is commonly understood to denote a patent covering a function never before performed, a wholly novel device, or one of such novelty and importance as to mark a distinct step in the progress of the art, as distinguished from a mere improvement or perfection of what has gone before.[1] Such patents will receive a broad and liberal construction,[2] and are

(3) An inventor, who took the important, but long-delayed and therefore not obvious step from the pulling of candy by hand to the performance of the same function by machine, making candy pulling more sanitary, greatly reducing its cost, and enlarging the field of the art, was a pioneer. entitled to a liberal range of equivalents.[3]

[§ 356] 8. Improvements. That a patent is not of a pioneer character does not prevent its owner from invoking the doctrine of equivalents,[4] although ordinarily such a patent cannot be construed as liberally as a pioneer invention.[5] Where the invention, although for an improvement only, is of a meritorious character, the range of equivalents is reasonably broad and fair,[6] and in some cases the patent may be liberally construed with a corresponding range of equivalents.[7] Where the invention is a narrow specific improvement upon prior inventions, the field of equivalents is restricted and the patent must be narrowly construed.[8] One who merely makes and se-

[a] Improvement on patentee's own invention.—The patentee cannot give an improvement of his own patent a greater scope than it would have had if he had improved another man's patented disclosure, merely because the first disclosure was his own. McCaskey Register Co. v. Mantz, 224 Fed. 495, 140 CCA 203.

cures a patent for a slight improvement on an old device or combination, which performed the same functions before as after the improvement, is protected against those only who use the very device or improvement he describes or claims, or mere colorable evasions of it.[9] The term "mechanical equivalent," when applied to a slight and almost immaterial improvement in the progress of an art, has a very narrow and limited meaning.[10]

[§ 357] 9. Amendment in Patent Office—a. In General. Limitations placed in a claim by amendment in response to rejections by the patent office must be regarded as material, and therefore the claim cannot be given the meaning which it would have had without amendment.[11] The rule applies to cases in which the original claim is narrower than

[b] If the advance is gradual, so that no one can claim the complete machine, each inventor is entitled only to his own specific form of device. Universal Rim Co. v. Firestone Steel Products Co., 289 Fed. 884 [aff 7 F. (2d) 24]; Elliott Mach. Co. v. P. B. Appeldoorn's Sons Co., 267 Fed. 983 [cit Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Sayles, 97 U. Sparks-Withington Co., 258 Fed. 45 [aff 270 Fed. 449].

[c] When improved result accomplished by a patented device is due to a more exact or refined application of old principles, care must be taken to limit the claims to those new features which give the better result. Adams, etc., Co. v. Peter Gray & Sons, Inc., 206 Fed. 303 [aff 218 Fed. 173, 134 CCA 53].

[d] Patent depending on single feature.—Where a patent depends for its novelty over the prior art upon a single limited feature of construction, the claims cannot be expanded by any doctrine of equivalents to cover a device which lacks that single essential feature. Liberman v. Ruwell, 170 Fed. 590, 95 CCA 134 [aff 165 Fed. 208].

the patent as well as to cases in which it is broader.[12] So it applies, although the objections to the claim were unfounded and the limitation unnecessary.[13] Mere formal amendments, however, will not limit the patent;[14] and in any event the patent will not be limited by the amendment beyond what is necessary,[15] the patentee is not estopped where he does

[d] Effect as to withdrawn suggestions in specifications.—Where the inventor's disclosure was fully contained in his original specification, his claims thereunder having been rejected, a substituted claim should not be read as purporting to cover withdrawn suggestions of variant structures, so as to invalidate the same, it appearing that the suggestions were withdrawn where the rejection of claims that were appropriate was acquiesced in. [a] Illustration of rule.—The patentee having been defeated in interference proceedings as to one form of device, priority of invention being found in favor of the other party, at his instigation, in order to defeat the right of such party to a patent, public use proceedings were instituted, in which it was shown that, for over two years prior to the time to which such party could carry back his invention, this form of the device had been manufactured and used by the company where the patentee was employed. It was held that, while this showing was fatal to the right of the other party to a patent, it did not change the status of the patentee, or restore his rights to the device as in fact the prior inventor, his own patent having been already taken out after he had canceled claims covering this form. [a] Elimination of nonessential matter.—Where the alteration required was the elimination of extrinsic nonessential matter, which obscured the description of the essential feature of the invention, the result is a narrowing of the requirements and the consequent broadening of the claims. Hess-Bright Mfg. Co. v. Fichtel, 219 Fed. 723, 135 CCA 421 [certiorari den 238 U. S. 633 mem, 35 SCt 661 mem, 59 L. ed. 1494 mem].

not claim anything which he has abandoned,[16] and an amendment in reference to an incidental matter does not necessarily exclude a liberal interpretation when the invention is a broad one.[17] The cancellation of a claim in an application for a patent which is substantially identical with a remaining claim does not affect the validity of the latter.[18]

[§ 358] b. Voluntary Amendment. An amended claim, voluntarily restricted, cannot by construction or the doctrine of equivalents be given the scope which it might have had without the amendment.[19] That a patentee voluntarily introduced into his application by amendment broader claims, which were allowed, does not deprive him of the right to have them construed as broadly as their language implies,[20] or hold as an infringer one whose structure comes within them, although not within the original claims.[21] Where a claim was voluntarily amended and broadened after its allowance, the patentee is not estopped to interpret it in the narrower form originally presented.[22] The voluntary cancellation of a claim in an application for a patent does not create an estoppel, affecting the construction or scope of other claims as allowed.[23]

Claims broadened to cover competitive devices. While claims allowed after their amendment and drawn to read on what a competitor had just put out cannot be disregarded where they are supported by the original specifications,[24] they will be closely scanned and strictly construed[25] to see that the patent has not been enlarged beyond the invention disclosed by the original application.[26]

[§ 359] 10. Combination. Every element included in a combination claim must be regarded as material, and therefore the claim covers nothing less than the entire combination.[27] While a patent for

[a] Mistake in failing to impose limitation.—Where by mistake the examiner did not impose a close enough limitation to narrow a patent as he meant to do, the patent could not be made over, as against the patentee, because of the mistake of the examiner in failing to phrase it properly. Nisbet v. Perkins Tonneau Wind Shield Co., 269 Fed. 633.

[b] Rejection of claims later allowed.—Where two claims of plaintiff's patent, after being rejected by the examiner, were later allowed, there is no reason for a strict construction of another claim. Penhollow, supra. And see infra [b]).

[b] Matters not disclosed by references.—Where a patentee acquiesces in the rejection of its claim on references cited in the patent office and accepts a patent on an amended claim, he is not estopped from securing by his amended claim every known and useful improvement which he has invented and which is not disclosed by the references. a combination covering old elements has been said to require a strict construction,[28] such a construction is not required where the patent is a distinct advance in the art.[29]

Location of element. Where the location of one element in a combination is fixed absolutely or relatively by reference to another element, a fair construction of such language is obtainable only from a study of the entire patent.[30] Even where the language of a claim fixes the position of an element in a combination absolutely, the court in determining infringement will look beyond the mere language.[31]

Arrangement of parts. A claim of a patent for a combination is to be interpreted to include such connections and relations of the several means of the combination which are named as implied therewith to make them operative in conformity with the specification.[32]

Claim for element or subcombination. When a combination is claimed, it is said that there is an implied concession that the elements are separately old.[33] But an element[34] or subcombination may be separately claimed,[35] although without utility, save in combination with the other parts of the device.[36] The fact that a device is entitled to a wide range of equivalents does not entitle subcombinations to a similar range.[37]

[§ 360] 11. Claims for Process. It is only necessary, in a process patent, to point one way of carrying out the process.[38] As in other cases,[39] the patentee of a process patent will be allowed appropriate equivalents.[40] When required by the state of the art, such patent will be narrowly construed,[41] and limited to a correspondingly narrow range of equivalents.[42] Process claims must stand or fall on their merits, and are not dependent on product claims.[43]

[§ 361] 12. Claims for Product. A patent for a new product, having definite characteristics which distinguish it, is not necessarily limited to the precise process described as the method of obtaining it,[44] unless the product is claimed as produced by

[a] Useless element.—(1) A patentee who has specified an element as part of the combination is bound thereby, although the element be valueless in the combination. Deister Concentrator Co. v. Deister Mach. Co., 263 Fed. 706. (2) But the fact that the specification of a patent, in describing the invention, describes a device which is, in fact, entirely useless so far as contributing to the result is concerned, does not restrict the claims to a combination including such device as an element where it is not mentioned therein. Barnes v. Lango, 151 Fed. 59.

[b] Requisites of combination claim.—A claim for a patent cannot be treated as a combination claim, in the absence of the word "combination" and of a statement of a specific element of which it is composed. [a] Use of apparatus.—(1) As the apparatus shown in a process patent is only to show that the process may be practically applied, it follows that such illustrative apparatus does not limit the process patentee to that type of machine alone. Composition of matter. In a patent for a composition of matter, the patentee is entitled to appropriate equivalents,[46] but the specifications and claims must be broad enough to cover them.[47] Where the composition is broadly old, the patent should be strictly construed and the patentee given no more than he claimed.[48]

[§ 362] 13. Separate Claims Distinguished. The entire patent being construed as a whole,[49] it follows that, in construing some of the claims of the patent, it should be compared with the other claims.[50] But each claim is in effect an independent invention,[51] and the several claims must be so construed where possible as to give them different meanings;[52] broad claims must, if possible, be construed to have different meanings from specific claims;[53] and a limitation found in one claim, whereby alone it substantially differs from another, cannot be read into the other.[54]

[§ 363] 14. Designs. Design patents govern not merely the identical design disclosed, but such as so nearly resemble it in appearance as to deceive ordinary observers.[55] The ordinary principles of construction apply.[56]

In re Ellis, 37 App. (D. C.) 203. (2) In a patent for an alloy, described as an alloy of cerium "with certain other metals, in particular iron," the equivalency of other metals with iron is to be found, not in their chemical structure, but in their functional efficiency, when combined with cerium in a metallic alloy. XIII. OWNERSHIP, TRANSFERS, ASSIGNMENTS, LICENSES, AND CONTRACTS*[57]

[§ 364] A. Ownership—1. In General. The general nature of a patent as a grant, a statutory creation, a contract, a monopoly, and as property, has already been discussed in another part of this article,[58] as has been the general nature of patentees' rights.[59] The legal title to a patent may be in one person and the equitable title in another.[60] In such a case the holder of the legal title is considered a trustee for the equitable owner.[61] But the legal title will prevail over the equitable title unless the former was acquired with notice of the latter.[62] The legal title to a patent does not necessarily vest in the person to whom it is issued.[63] Title to the patent upon its issuance vests by operation of law in a person to whom the inventor has previously assigned his invention and his inchoate right to a patent, notwithstanding the patent was issued in the name of the inventor,[64] or the inventor died before the issuance of the patent;[65] and this, whether or not the commissioner of patents has been requested to issue the patent to the assignee.[66] Where an assignment of an invention is in itself insufficient to a design patent is entitled depends on the invention's position in the art. America Fabrics Co. v. Richmond Lace Works, 24 F. (2d) 365; Cocacola Co. v. Whistle Co., 20 F. (2d) 955; King Ventilating Co. v. St. James Ventilating Co., 17 F. (2d) 615 [aff 26 F. (2d) 357]; Whiting Mfg. Co. v. Alvin Silver Co., 283 Fed. 75 [certiorari den 260 U. S. 731 mem, 43 SCt 93 mem, 67 L. ed. 486 mem]; North British Rubber Co. v. Racine Rubber Tire Co., 271 Fed. 936; Borgfeldt v. Weiss, 265 Fed. 268; Byers v. F. T. Pearce Co., 228 Fed. 720.

[d] Drawings (1) assist the specification, but do not control, even when the specifications consist largely of references to the design drawings. King Ventilating Co. v. St. James Ventilating Co., 17 F. (2d) 615 [aff 26 F. (2d) 357]; Whiting Mfg. Co. v. Alvin Silver Co., 283 Fed. 75 [certiorari den 260 U. S. 731 mem, 43 SCt 93 mem, 67 L. ed. 486 mem]; Borgfeldt v. Weiss, 265 Fed. 268. Contra Frank v. Hess, 84 Fed. 170. (2) But a patent not describing the design in writing is limited substantially to the pattern shown in the drawing. American Fabrics Co. v. Richmond Lace Works, 24 F. (2d) 365.

[a] History of rule.—(1) The earlier cases have been interpreted to decide that a request that the patent issue to the assignee is essential to vest legal title in him upon the issuance of the patent to the assignor. Harrison v. Morton, 83 Md. 456, 35 A 99 [dism 171 U. S. 38, 18 SCt 742, 43 L. ed. 63] (based upon a statement, in Gayler v. Wilder, 10 How. (U. S.) 477, 493, 13 L. ed. 504, "the assignment requests that the patent may issue to the assignee"). And see Johnson v. Wilcox, etc., Co., 27 Fed. 689, 23 Blatchf. 531; Wright v. convey the legal title to the patent when issued to the assignee,[67] it may nevertheless have conveyed an inchoate title in the invention,[68] and the subsequent issuance of letters patent thereon in the assignor's name vests the equitable title to the patent in the assignee by operation of law.[69]

[§ 365] 2. Joint Owners. There is no limitation in the United States of the number of persons who may be joint owners of a patent right.[70] Where a patent is issued to two or more persons, they become coöwners,[71] or owners in common,[72] or cotenants,[73] or tenants in common,[74] of the right and property secured by the patent. The assignment of an undivided interest in a patent right constitutes the assignee a joint owner with the assignor.[75] Joint owners of a patent right have interests which are distinct and separate in their nature;[76] and where a patent is issued to two persons, each of the joint patentees is invested with an undivided half interest in the patent.[77]

Partnership. The legal title to a patent issued to two persons designated as composing a named firm is in the parties jointly, and not in the firm.[78] In the absence of an agreement creating a partnership between the parties,[79] coöwners of a patent are not partners inter se or as to third persons.[80] But by an agreement between the parties creating the relation,[81] patent rights may be held in partnership like other property, the mutual rights and liabilities of the partners being determined by the agreement of the parties and the general law of partnership.[82]

Joint ownership in equity. Where a patent is issued to one person and the legal title thereto is in him, agreements between such person and other parties may make them joint owners in equity,[83] or Wilder, supra, as requiring such a request in order that title vest in the assignee, especially in view of the later decision in Philadelphia, etc., R. Co. v. Trimble, 10 Wall. (U. tenants in common in equity.[84] And under an agreement that a patent is to be taken out in the joint names of two or more persons, or for their joint benefit, the parties are in equity joint owners.[85] Where a joint application by two persons is rejected, a patent for the same invention subsequently obtained by one of them in his own name inures to both, and they are joint owners.[86]

Rights, powers, and liabilities of coöwners.[87] The use of a patent right is different from the use of any other property, and in determining the rights, powers, and liabilities of coöwners of patents it is not safe to follow the rules adopted in regard to coowners of ordinary chattels.[88] The nature of a patent is such that joint owners in it are at the mercy of each other.[89] In the absence of a special agreement,[90] each coöwner may manufacture, use, and sell the patented invention with or without the consent of his coöwner,[91] no matter how small his interest may be,[92] without liability to account for his individual use of the invention,[93] and without being liable to account for profits,[94] unless such profits accrue after a joint owner has procured an assignment of his coöwner's interest to himself by fraud.[95] Still, a part owner of a patent has no right to use an infringing device; if he does he is liable to his coowner for the wrong done.[96] One part owner cannot bind his coöwner by any special contract with an assignee of the patent, not connected with the enjoyment and exercise of the common privilege under the patent.[97] Nor can one part owner prejudice the rights of his coöwners, as by a release of the right to recover damages for an infringement.[98] The rights of the coöwners may, however, be limited by an express contract.[99] Where two persons unite in obtaining a joint patent, neither can set up a prior

"It would not be safe to conclude that, because the owner in common of a horse is not liable though he retains the exclusive use of him, therefore the part owner of the patent who uses it exclusively is not liable; nor because the tenant in common of the grain or liquor who uses it exclusively and consumes it in using is liable, therefore the part owner of the patent is liable. There is a possibility that the part owner of the patent may so supply the market as to appropriate to himself the whole value of the patent; and, on the other hand, his use of it may have the effect to create a market so extensive as greatly to enhance the value of the whole patent. On the whole, then, we are compelled to reject all arguments from analogy, and look at the question upon its own apparent merits." Vose v. Singer, supra.

[a] Reason for rule.—"The use of an invention by one of co-owners or by his licensees is not the exercise of the entire monopoly conferred by the patent That can be effected only by the joint or concurrent action of all owners. The separate action of any one owner or of his licensees can be an exercise or use only of his individual right, which, though exclusive of all besides, is not exclusive of the other patentees, their assignees or licensees. On principle, therefore, there can be no accountability on the part of a part owner of an invention to other owners for profits made by the exercise of his individual right, whether it be by engaging in the manufacture and sale, or by granting to others licenses, or by assigning interests in the patent. His use of the invention in any lawful way is not an appropriation of anything which belongs to another. The separate rights of the other owners remain unaffected. They are equally free to use the invention in all legitimate ways for their individual profit. Each is entitled to the fruits of his endeavors, taking no risk and expecting no reward from enterprises in which he does not choose to join." Blackledge v. Weir, etc., Mfg. Co., 108 Fed. 71, 76, 47 CCA 212.

[§ 366] B. Assignments and Other Transfers[2]—1. Introductory. Patent property is the creature of statute law and its incidents are equally so, and they depend upon the construction to be given to the statutes creating it and them, in view of the policy of congress in their enactment.[3] It is not safe, therefore, in dealing with a transfer of rights under the patent law to follow implicitly rules governing a transfer of rights in a chose in action at common law.[4]

[§ 367] 2. Assignability. Under the express terms of the patent law,[5] patents or any interests therein are assignable,[6] absolutely and without restriction.[7] An equitable interest in a patent is assignable.[8]

Partial assignments. The monopoly granted by the patent laws is one entire thing, and cannot be divided into parts except as authorized by law.[9] The subject matter of a patent is not partible except in respect of territorial assignment;[10] a single claim of a patent consisting of several claims is not assignable.[11]

An assignment of a patent is not a sale of an invention within the meaning of the provision of the patent law relating to sales before application for patent.[12]

Effect of license. The grant of a license does not preclude a subsequent assignment by the owner of his interest therein.[13] But a patent is not assignable where the patentee has by contract with a licensee imposed upon himself a relation of trust and con-

S.) 289, 15 L. ed. 403; Fraser v. Gates, 118 Ill. 99, 1 NE 817; Marston v. Swett, 66 N. Y. 206, 23 AmR 43. (2) The cotenant's right to an accounting under such an agreement is enforceable notwithstanding a prior adjudication of the coöwner as bankrupt. Fraser v. Gates, supra.

[b] Right to manufacture and sell only.—A contract between joint owners may give each the right to manufacture and sell, but no right to the exclusive use of the patent. Central Brass, etc., Co. v. Stuber, 220 Fed. 909, 136 CCA 475.

[c] Statute of frauds.—Where an inventor of a new principle in mechanics assigns one-half interest in the invention to another, in consideration of an agreement that each shall share equally in the cost of procuring a patent to them jointly, and in the profits and expenses and losses, and the patent is issued to both, and for some time they account to each other, the statute of frauds will not be applied to defeat the enforcement of the agreement, for the reasons that the contract has been fully executed on one side, and might have been performed within one year, although not so expected. Fraser v. Gates, 118 Ill. 99, 1 NE 817.

[d] Effect of fraud upon contract.—(1) A patentee waived a reassignment of a coöwner's interest in a patent under a contract providing for assignment on failure to sell a certain number of patented articles during year following execution of contract, where patent was not issued until almost four months after expiration of year and patentee requested coowner not to sell before issuance of patent, and falsely represented to coowner that by reason of certain improvements patent was valueless to coöwner. Haserot v. Keller, 67 CalA 659, 228 P 383. (2) If provision in contract for reassignment by coöwner of interest in a patent on failure to sell a certain number of patented articles did not amount to covenant for a forfeiture, coöwner was excused from performance where patentee falsely represented that patent was valueless to coöwner because of certain improvements. Haserot v. Keller, supra. (3) Patentee's statement to coöwner to induce an assignment of coöwner's interest, that undisclosed improvements perfected by him on patented device rendered it valueless to coöwner, was a positive assertion of fact as to which he possessed means of information not accessible to coöwner, and not a mere opinion, and therefore amounted to fraud upon the coöwner. Haserot v. Keller, supra. (4) Elements and effect of fraud generally see Fraud §§ 6–85.

[a] Reason for rule.—"For it was obviously not the intention of the legislature to permit several monopolies to be made out of one, and divided among different persons within the same limits. Such a division would inevitably lead to fraudulent impositions upon persons who desired to purchase the use of the improvement, and would subject a party who, under a mistake as to his rights, used the invention without authority, to be harassed by a multiplicity of suits instead of one, and to successive recoveries of damages by different persons holding different portions of the patent right in the same place." Assignee takes subject to prior lifidence as to the licensee;[14] nor can the patentee who has granted such a license transfer by assignment his rights under the contract as separate from his unassignable personal duties thereunder;[15] nor is a patentee's right to make, use, and sell the invention, reserved to the patentee alone in a license granting an exclusive right, assignable.[16] But the owner of a patent is not precluded from assigning his interests by reason of a prior contract appointing a person his exclusive agent to manufacture and sell the patented invention in specified territory.[17]

Right to prosecute infringement. Although it has been held that the right to assign "any interest" in a patent[18] includes the right to assign the patentee's power to prosecute infringers,[19] the weight of authority is that the monopoly conferred upon the patentee by the issuance of a patent is not assignable alone,[20] since it is a mere incident of the inventor's common-law right to make, use, and sell the patented article,[21] and can be transferred by assignment only when attached to the right to make, use, and sell.[22] Thus a patentee cannot assign merely the right to exclude a particular party from making, using, or vending the patented article, with the right to recover damages for past or future infringements by such party.[23]

[§ 368] 3. What Constitutes Assignment[24]—a. In General. Under the statute[25] a patentee or his assigns may, by instrument in writing, assign, grant, and convey, either: (1) The whole patent, comprising the exclusive right to make, use, and vend the invention throughout the United States. (2) An undivided part or share of that exclusive right. (3) The exclusive right under the patent within and throughout a specified part of the United States.[26] A transfer of either of these three kinds of interests is an assignment, properly speaking, and vests in the assignee a title in so much of the patent itself.[27] An instrument which does not purport to convey any present interest in an existing patent, or in one for which an application is pending, is not an assignment within the statute.[28] Still, an assignment may be either absolute, in trust, or by way of mortgage, and liable to be defeated by nonperformance of a condition subsequent.[29]

An option to purchase patent rights is not an assignment see infra § 390.

29. See cases infra this note.

[a] Transfer held mortgage to secure obligation.—Where a patentee agrees to assign a two-thirds interest in certain patents, and the assignee agrees to furnish the patentee with certain funds and goods as long as he is satisfied with the arrangement, and the agreement also provides that in case the assignee becomes dissatisfied after a certain time he may terminate the agreement, with the right, however, to retain his interest as security for whatever the patentee may owe him, and thereafter the patentee conveys by deed to the assignee a two-thirds interest in one of the patents, the transfer is a mortgage of the patent to secure the patentee's obligation to the grantee. Barry v. Coville, 129 N. Y. 302, 29 NE 307.

[b] Mortgage constitutes transfer of legal title.—Waterman v. Mackensignment.[30] On the other hand, where an owner of a patent sells it for part cash and part notes, and he deposits an assignment of the patent in escrow, conditioned upon its redelivery to him upon default in payment of the notes, the transaction is not an option but a binding contract of purchase and sale.[31]

[§ 369] b. License Distinguished.[32] Any transfer of rights under a patent which is short of a conveyance to the transferee of the patentee's exclusive right to make, use, and vend the invention throughout the United States, or in a specified part thereof, or of an undivided part or share of that exclusive right,[33] is a mere license[34] giving the licensee no title in the patent.[35] Further, to constitute an assignment, the exclusive right granted by the transferor must be exclusive of the patentee, as well as

[a] Illustrations.—(1) An instrument providing that, in consideration of the payment of a certain sum by the party of the second part to the party of the first part, the party of the first part "hereby agrees" to deliver to the second party all of his rights to the use of a certain patent, and "does hereby grant and convey" such rights, is a mere option, the second party not agreeing to buy or pay for the patent rights. Strauss v. Brier, 57 Colo. 65, 140 P 183. (2) A transaction giving an option to purchase a patent accompanied by a deposit of letters patent with a trust company to secure such agreement is not an assignment or transfer of title to the patent. Barber Asphalt Pav. Co. v. Standard Asphalt, etc., Co., 30 F. (2d) 281. (3) Where defendant was given by plaintiff an irrevocable license to purchase certain letters patent enumerated in the agreement exercisable within five years, but did not bind itself to purchase, and plaintiff at the request of defendant subsequently assigned to it five letters patent issued after execution of the agreement between them, such letters not having issued on application for letters pending when the agreement was executed, assignment by plaintiff to defendant at its request did not constitute exercise of option to purchase the enumerated letters patent to render it liable to make bulk payment to plaintiff of forty thousand dollars. "The grant of an exclusive right under the patent within a certain district, which does not include the right to make, and the right to use, and the right to sell, is not a grant of a title in the whole patent right within the district, and is therefore only a license." Waterman v. Mackenzie, 138 U. S. 252, 256, 11 SCt 334, 34 L. ed. 923.

[a] "Grantee" and "licensee" of patent compared.—"There are three classes of persons in whom the patentee can vest an interest of some kind in the patent. They are an assignee, a grantee of an exclusive sectional right, and a licensee. An assignee is one who has had transferred to him in writing the whole interest of the original patent, or any undivided part of such whole interest, in every portion of the United States; and no one, unless he has such interest transferred to him, is an assignee. A grantee is one who has transferred to him, in writing, the exclusive right under the patent, to make and use, and to grant to others to make and use, the thing patented, within and throughout some specified part or portion of the United States. Such right must be an exclusive sectional right, excluding the patentee therefrom. A licensee is one who has had transferred to him, in writing or orally, a less or different interest than either the interest in the whole patent, or an undivided part of such whole interest, or an exclusive sectional interest." Potter v. Holland, 19 F. Cas. No. 11,329, 4 Blatchf. 206, 211, 1 Fish. Pat. Cas. 327.

[c] Transfer of right to make and sell only.—(1) A grant limited to the exclusive right to manufacture and sell, without the right to use a patented invention, is a license, and not an assignment. Hayward v. Andrews, 106 U. S. 672, 1 SCt 544, 27 L. ed. 271; Excelsior Wooden Pipe Co. v. Seattle, 117 Fed. 140, 55 CCA 156; Atwood Lock Co. v. Yale, etc., Mfg. Co., 115 Fed. 332; McFadden v. Alexander, 154 Iowa 716, 135 NW 396. (2) An agreement by which the owner of a patent grants to another "the sole and exclusive right and license to manufacture and sell" the patented article throughout the United States, not expressly authorizing him to use it, is not an assignment, but a license. Waterman v. Mackenzie, 138 U. S. 252, 11 SCt 334, 34 L. ed. 923. (3) The grant of an exclusive right to make and vend an article within a certain territory, upon paying to the assignor an agreed royalty, and reserving to the assignor the right to use and manufacture the article by paying a specified royalty to the assignee, is only a license. Gayler v. Wilder, 10 How. (U. S.) 477, 13 L. ed. 504.

[d] Transfer of right to make and use only.—(1) The transfer of a right "to use and manufacture and sell rights to use" a patented invention in specified territory is a license, and not an assignment, the right to sell being withheld. Rice v. Boss, 46 Fed. 195. (2) The transfer of a right to make and use a patented invention, but not to sell, is a license, and not an assignment. Mitchell v. Hawley, 16 Wall. (U. S.) 544, 21 L. ed. 322. (3) A transfer or grant of the right to make and use a patented appliance upon a particular machine, or a number of machines, or cars, amounts to no more than a license so to make and use it within such fixed limits. Ft. Wayne, etc., R. Co. v. Haberkorn, 15 Ind. A. 479, 44 NE 322.

[e] Transfer of the right to use and vend only.—(1) A transfer of the right to use and vend a patented invention is a license, and not an assignment. Oliver v. Rumford Chemical Works, 109 U. S. 75, 3 SCt 61, 27 L. ed. 862; Baldwin v. Sibley, 2 F. Cas. No. 805, 1 Cliff. 150. (2) A grant to use and sell or dispose of patented machines confers a license, and is not an assignment. Farrington v. Gregory, 8 F. Cas. No. 4,688, 4 Fish. Pat. Cas. 221. (3) Where a patentee grants the exclusive right to use and vend the patented invention within a specified territory, reserving to himself the right of manufacture, the legal title to the monopoly remains in him, and the transaction is a license. Hill v. Whitcomb, 11 F. Cas. No. 6,502, 1 Bann. & A. 34, Holmes 317; Sanford v. Messer, 21 F. Cas. No. 12,314, 5 Fish. Pat. Cas. 411, Holmes 149.

[f] Transfer of right "to use and to have used."—A contract whereby strangers.[36] But the reservation or exception by the grantor of a mere personal right, amounting merely to a license back to him from the assignee, will not reduce the transfer from an assignment to a license;[37] nor will a condition subsequent in a transfer of rights under a patent reduce the grant to a mere license.[38] So, also, a grant of an exclusive right, to make, use, and sell a certain number of the patented machines within a specified territory is, in effect, if not technically, an assignment, notwithstanding the limitation of the number of machines.[39] The patentee may sell his exclusive right for a term of years less than the full term of the patent, but in such case the legal title remains in him, and the transfer constitutes a mere license.[40]

[§ 370] c. Determination of Character of Transfer. Whether a transfer of a particular right or interest under a patent is an assignment or a license depends upon the effect of the whole contract,[41] and upon the legal effect of its provisions, and not upon the name by which it calls itself,[42] or the motive of the parties.[43] But the fact that the instrument is a patentee grants "the exclusive right to use and to have used the said" patented article "as embodied in the aforesaid letters patent and applications," for a specified term, is a license, and not an assignment. Bell, etc., Co. v. Spoor, 216 Ill. A. 221.

[g] Transfer of exclusive right "to manufacture, sell, and use devices made according to any and all letters patent" owned by the assignor, and limited to the assignee, a corporation, wherever the "devices come within the scope of the business of said Company as stated in their articles of incorporation," is a license, and not an assignment. Johnson v. Uprite Mfg. Co., Ltd., 27 Oh. A. 173, 161 NE 26, 27.

[h] Grant of right to sue infringers does not change instrument granting license to make, use, and sell patented invention into an assignment. Johnson v. Uprite Mfg. Co., Ltd., 27 Oh. A. 173, 161 NE 26.

[i] A transfer of a single claim of a patent consisting of several claims is a mere license. Pope Mfg. Co. v. Gormully, etc., Mfg. Co., 144 U. S. 248, 12 SCt 641, 36 L. ed. 423.

[a] Illustrations.—(1) An instrument granting the sole and exclusive license to manufacture, sell, and use a patented article, but reserving to the grantor the exclusive right to manufacture, sell, and use certain specific apparatus only for certain purposes, although called a "license," was in legal effect an assignment, with reservation of a license to the grantor. Sirocco Engineering Co. v. Monarch Ventilator Co., 184 Fed. 84. (2) Reservation by grantor of right to manufacture in territory specified in grant, in common with grantee, does not prevent transfer. [a] An instrument worded as a mere license may, on account of the actual interest conveyed, amount to an assignment. Union Switch, etc., Co. v. Johnson R. Signal Co., 61 Fed. 940, 10 CCA 176 [rev 59 Fed. 20]; Ritter v. Serrell, 20 F. Cas. No. 11,866, 2 Blatchf. 379; Lowry v. Cowles Electric Co., C. D. (1893) 549; Rapp v. Killing, C. D. (1890) 483; Douglass v. Campbell, 24 Oh. Cir. Ct. 241.

[b] Transfers held to be assignments.—(1) The transfer of an exclusive right to make, use, and sell a patented invention is an assignment, and not a license. Rapp v. Kelling, 41 Fed. 792; La Baw v. Hawkins, 14 F. Cas. No. 7,961, 2 Bann. & A. 561. (2) Instrument which transfers to assignee all that United States confers on patentee by terms of letters patent is an assignment. Green v. Le Clair, 24 F. (2d) 74. (3) A contract purporting to convey for a prescribed royalty the exclusive right to make, use, and sell a patented invention in the United States is an assignment, and not a license. Union Switch, etc., Co. v. Johnson R. Signal Co., 61 Fed. 940, 10 CCA 176. (4) An agreement granting the sale and exclusive right, license, and privilege to manufacture, use, and sell machines embodying patented inventions, the grant being absolute without conditional limitation, and for the life of the patent, increases in royalties which are the consideration of the grant alone being contingent on the validity of the patent and the establishment of a monopoly, is an assignment, and not a license. Comptograph Co. v. Burroughs Adding Mach. Co., 179 Iowa 83, 159 NW 465. (5) An instrument by which a patentee conveyed to a corporation, "its assigns and legal representatives, the exclusive right to manufacture, use, and sell, and to sell to others to be used and sold, said improvements as patented . . . throughout the United States and territories thereof, to the full extent of the term for which said patents are or may be granted," is not merely an exclusive license, but constitutes an assignment granting all the patentee's rights; its character is not changed by the fact that the consideration to the patentee was to be a certain sum on each machine made by the grantee embodying the patented invention, designated in the contract as a "license fee," nor by reason of a clause in the nature of a condition subsequent authorizing the termination of the contract by either party in certain contingencies, nor because it provided that, in case of infringement, suits against the infringers should at once be brought "at the request of the company," maintained under the joint direction and at the joint expense of the parties, and that the damages recovered should be equally divided. D. M. Sechler Carriage Co. v. Deere, etc., Co., 113 Fed. 285, 287, 51 CCA 242. (6) A contract between two joint owners of a patent, intended to perfect and establish in each respectively the exclusive right to the patent in certain states, constitutes an assignment and vests title in each for the state designated. Russell v. Kern, 58 Fed. 382 [aff 69 Fed. 94, 16 CCA 154]; Russell v. Kendall, 58 Fed. 381. (7) Where complainant conveyed absolutely his interest in the discovery of formulæ for the preparation of certain proprietary medicines for a term of fifty years, and granted the exclusive use of his name as a trade-mark in connection with the preparations for the same time, the transferee was not a mere licensee, but was vested with complainant's entire estate and interest in the subject matter. Barclay v. Charles Roome Parmele Co., 71 N. J. Eq. 769, 71 A 1133 [aff 70 N. J. Eq. 218, 61 A 715].

[c] Contract to join forces in suing infringers, embodied in an instrument transferring rights under a patent, to the effect that the assignor and the assignee should consider suits against infringers, and if they cannot agree, either may proceed at his own expense, does not alter the effect of such instrument as an assignment. Green v. Le Clair, 24 F. (2d) 74.

[e] Reservation of mill right will not prevent legal transfer. Russell v. Kern, 58 Fed. 382.

Effect of covenant or condition as qualification of interest assigned see infra § 397.

Nature of an assignment see supra § 368.

called a "license" upon its face, although not controlling, is significant as showing the intent of the parties.[44] The recording of the instrument is evidence that it was intended as an assignment.[45]

[§ 371] 4. Who May Assign—a. In General. By the express provisions of the patent law, the patentee, his assigns, or legal representatives, may transfer interests in, or rights under, the patent.[46] Under these provisions an assignee in any degree may make assignments.[47] A patent may be assigned by the administrator[48] or by the executor[49] of a deceased patentee, or by one of two administrators.[50] The proper officers of a corporation may assign a patent which it owns.[51] The capacity of a married woman to assign a patent depends upon the laws of the several states.[52] Where, under the law of the state where the parties reside and where the transaction takes place, a husband and wife are authorized to make contracts and conveyances regarding personal property to and with each other as strangers,[53] a husband may make an assignment of a patent to his wife,[54] and a wife may assign a patent which she owns[55] to her husband[56] or to third persons.[57] There is authority that a patent may be assigned by an infant,[58] and that an assignment may be made by a person under guardianship,[59] although it has also been held that an assignment by a person of unsound mind is void.[60] A patent may be assigned by an agent of the owner,[61] where he has authority to do so,[62] in writing.[63] A trustee for joint beneficiaries, under an instrument expressly precluding him from the power to make transfers, may not assign.[64] A receiver of the property of the owner of a patent cannot assign such right so as to pass the legal title, unless the owner joins in the assignment.[65] But under a state statute authorizing a court of equity to order a conveyance of a debtor's property upon a creditor's bill,[66] a master may, under an order of the court, execute a conveyance of a patent owned by the debtor.[67]

[§ 372] b. Joint Owners. Either of the joint owners of a patent, who are at the mercy of each other,[68] may, in the absence of a special agreement,[69] assign to others his right to use, manufacture, or sell the invention[70] without the consent of his coöwners.[71] And a coöwner cannot maintain a suit for infringement against the grantee.[72] However, the right of a joint owner to assign extends only to his own interest,[73] and he has no right to assign the interest of his coproprietor without liability therefor.[74] And one of two complainants who are co-owners of a patent cannot, pending suit for infringement, make an assignment to defendant and thus defeat the other's right to recover damages.[75] One of several joint beneficiaries of the trust in a patent may not assign his interest,[76] for to permit such an assignment would obviate the object of a trust for joint owners, which is intended to avoid the effects of their being placed at each other's mercy.[77] Joint owners may restrict each other's right to assign by agreement.[78]

[§ 373] 5. Who May Be Assignee.[79] A married woman,[80] an infant,[81] or a person under guardianship,[82] may be the assignee of a patent. The statutory provision for the assignment of patents does not confine assignment to the immediate assignee of the invention, but includes an assignee in any degree.[83] In the United States, any number of persons may be joint assignees.[84]

[§ 374] 6. Agreements To Assign[85]—a. In General. An agreement to assign a patent, or an interest therein, is an executory contract[86] which is valid and enforceable.[87] The assignor's equitable interest in a patent may be transferred by such an agreement.[88]

Consideration. An agreement to assign a patent, like any other contract,[89] must be supported by a legal consideration.[90]

[§ 375] b. Future Patents.[91] The rule is well settled[92] that an inventor has an inchoate right to obtain a patent which he may sell or assign before a patent is issued and either before or after he has applied for a patent.[93] An agreement to assign inventions, patents for which have not yet been secured, may be enforced where it is sufficiently definite as to the subject matter, and where the parties, intending to contract for future inventions, use language plainly expressing such a purpose.[94] An assignment of an invention before the issue of a patent passes legal title to the invention to the assignee;[95] legal title to the patent vests in the assignee by operation of law upon the issuance of the patent in the assignor's name.[96]

Extension or renewal. The inchoate right of an inventor to an extension or renewal of his patent[97] may be the subject of a valid and enforceable assignment;[98] such an assignment passes an equitable title to the assignee.[99]

Performance or breach. A person who has advanced money to a patentee to construct and patent an invention under an agreement to incorporate should the invention be successful has an equitable interest in the invention and patent,[1] and is entitled to a lien thereon,[2] and on the price paid to the patentee who has sold the patent in contravention of his agreement;[3] but the transferee is liable only in accordance with his contract.[4] Breach of such a contract is not excused by a suspicion that the party advancing the money intended to steal the invention.[5] Under an agreement to purchase a certain described invention when patented, the purchaser is not liable to pay where the patent is for something substantially different, nor until a patent is issued and tendered;[6] on the other hand it has been held that a contract to transfer a patent is sufficiently complied with by an offer of the patent as issued, although such patent was not coextensive with the invention as claimed.[7] A contract to apply for patents and to assign patents granted is not broken by the opinion of defendant's patent attorney that the invention had been anticipated where there is no other matter constituting a breach.[8]

[§ 376] c. Future Inventions. Although generally an agreement to assign all future inventions, in gross, is not looked upon favorably by the courts, and will be strictly construed against the assignee,[9] still, provisions in an employment contract assigning to the employer all rights in the employee's inventions, and contracts as to future inventions with employees hired to make inventions, are valid and enforceable,[10] as are agreements to assign future inventions, relating to a particular subject.[11] Thus an assignment of future inventions fairly and reasonably necessary for the protection of the assignee of existing patents is valid;[12] and a contract to assign all future improvements which may be made upon an invention is valid and enforceable.[13] An assignment of future improvements vests in the assignee an equitable title to the improvements when made.[14]

License or assignment. An agreement to pay royalties on inventions to be made implies a provision for a license or transfer of the patents.[15]

Discharge of contract. A contract to give all subsequent inventions to a corporation is discharged by the insolvency of the corporation.[16]

(2) A contract, whereby the inventor of a paper feeding mechanism for a particular type of press assigned his patent to another and agreed to assign all future patents he acquired for any paper feeding mechanism during the term of the original patent, is not void as contrary to public policy. Miller Saw-Trimmer Co. v. Cheshire, 172 Wis. 278, 178 NW 855.

[b] Executory character of agreement.—An agreement which is worded to "grant and convey" all future inventions to be made in gas engines and mechanism to operate them is good as an executory agreement to sell and assign a future invention which may be enforced in equity, but it cannot operate as a sale or assignment of the invention. Regan Vapor-Engine Co. v. Pacific Gas-Engine Co., 49 Fed. 68, 1 CCA 169.

[c] Contract not personal.—An agreement to disclose future inventions relating to a particular subject is not personal and may be assigned. A. B. Dick Co. v. Fuller, 6 F. (2d) 393.

[d] Right to acquire patents from third person.—A contract providing that, if F obtained letters patent within two years on certain machines, he would assign them to a company, did not preclude the company from procuring another to secure patents on machinery designed to do the same work to be performed by F's machines. Forster v. Brown Hoisting Mach. Co., 266 Ill. 287, 107 NE 588, AnnCas1916B 795.

[a] Offer and acceptance.—(1) A resolution of a corporation accepting an offer to sell "the certain letters patent and patent applications as set forth in the letter herewith attached" is a sufficient acceptance of part of the offer agreeing to assign future improvements as well, the offer being made in the letter attached. Foreman's Systems v. Milk Dealers' Crate Corp., 13 Del. Ch. 351, 120 A 358. (2) A covenant in an assignment of a patent for future conveyances of patents for improvements is effective, although not covered by antecedent negotiations, where the assignors are officers and directors of the assignee, and the instrument is read aloud to the assignors and accepted by them. New Haven Sand Blast Co. v. Dreisbach, 102 Conn. 169, 128 A 320.

[b] Sale or option.—An offer to assign for a cash consideration to be payable on agreement by the assignee's attorneys as to the breadth and patentability of the claims creates a binding contract of sale, and not merely an option to purchase the patent rights. Adamson v. Alexander Milburn Co., 275 Fed. 148.

[c] Superseding contract.—A finding that an assignment of a patent to a corporation by the incorporators, containing no covenant to assign improvements, was not intended to supersede an earlier assignment containing such a covenant is supported by evidence showing that defendant called the attention of the buyer of stock to the covenant in the earlier assignment. New Haven Sand Blast Co. v. Dreisbach, 102 Conn. 169, 128 A 320.

[d] Annulment or release.—Where the organizers of a corporation agreed to assign future inventions or improvements to it, the payment of a retainer or salary to one party to conduct experiments does not annul the agreement or release another of the parties. is issued[18] may be oral.[19] Such agreements are not within the statute of frauds,[20] nor within the provision of the patent law[21] that patents shall be assignable by an instrument in writing.[22] A written assignment of an application for a patent, made by a corporation, need not be under seal.[23]

[§ 378] e. Recording. The assignment of a patent not yet issued need not be recorded,[24] and the record of such agreement, not being authorized, is not notice.[25]

[§ 379] f. Actions.[26] In an action for breach of a contract to assign a patent, general rules govern as to the admissibility of evidence under the issues in the case,[27] as to the sufficiency of evidence,[28] as to questions for the jury,[29] and as to findings.[30]

A cloud on the title to patent rights, resulting from a contract to assign an interest in the invention on issuance of the patent, may be removed by a court of equity,[31] and by statute such jurisdiction is given to a federal district court.[32] Likewise a court of equity may cancel the contract creating such a cloud on title,[33] but it should grant only such relief as was asked for, or relief of like nature.[34]

[§ 380] 7. Requisites and Validity of Assignments—a. In General. A patent right being in the United States the creature of the federal statutes,[35] it may be transferred only in the manner provided by such statutes.[36] The method provided by con-

(3) In such an action, on agreement of defendant's attorneys as to the breadth and patentability of the claims, the question of whether there was such a failure in the breadth and patentability of the claims as would not protect the purchaser of the patent in the manufacture, sale, and use of it, and so justify defendant's instruction to his attorneys to drop the matter prior to an adverse report from such attorneys, held for the jury. gress for the assignment of patents or any interests therein is the exclusive method of making such transfers,[37] and an assignment is sufficient if it conforms with the requirements of the patent law regardless of state statutes.[38] The validity of an assignment of a patent is determined by the same considerations as apply to other deeds and contracts.[39]

[§ 381] b. Form and Contents.[40] Under the provisions of the patent law,[41] an assignment of a patent must be by an instrument in writing executed by the patentee, or his assigns, or his legal representatives.[42] However, it has been held that, as between the parties, a verbal assignment is valid and passes an equitable right.[43] The assignment need not be under seal,[44] although executed by a corporation.[45] No particular form of written instrument is required,[46] but there must be some operative words expressing at least an intention to assign,[47] and, like any deed, the instrument must be free from ambiguity.[48] A mere certificate in writing that a certain person has a joint interest in a patent right with the subscriber will not operate as an assignment.[49] But an irrevocable power of attorney to hold and control a patent may operate as an assignment,[50] although the appointment of an agent, not vesting in the appointee a legal or equitable title to the patent, is not an assignment, although irrevocable.[51]

Description of right conveyed; designation of assignee. The instrument must describe the right conveyed so that it can be identified, but this is sufficient, no technical or particular description being required.[52] So, also, a designation of the assignee

[d] Addition of patentee's middle initial in description of patent in assignment, although the patent as issued omits such initial, is immaterial where the assignment otherwise describes the patent by number, the date of the issue, and the name. Bas-sufficient for identification is sufficient.[53]

Assignment by agent. The assignment of a patent by an agent[54] must be made in the name of the owner;[55] such an assignment in the name of the agent is insufficient to convey the owner's title to the patent.[56]

[§ 382] c. Consideration.[57] An instrument, to operate as an assignment of a patent, must be supported by a valuable consideration.[58] The consideration for the assignment of a patent may consist of a promise to pay the specified sum of money and specified royalties,[59] or it may be in the form of royalties to be paid by the assignee,[60] or of a share in the profits made by him.[61]

[§ 383] d. Recording.[62] The patent law expressly provides that an assignment, grant, or conveyance of a patent or interest therein shall be void as against any subsequent purchaser or mortgagee for a valuable consideration, without notice, unless it is recorded in the patent office within three months from the date thereof, or prior to such subsequent purchase or mortgage.[63] Although there is authority that an assignment of a patent must be recorded to be operative as such,[64] it has been held that the provisions of the statute are merely directory for the protection of bona fide purchasers;[65] as to them the assignment is void unless recorded as prescribed.[66] Under the latter view, the statute does not require the recording of an assignment within three months as a prerequisite to its validity.[67] Hence, an unrecorded assignment is valid as between the parties,[68] or as against infringers,[69] or even as against a sub-

[a] Reasons for rule.—(1) "By section 5 of the act of March 3, 1897, relating to patents . . . it is declared that, if an assignment of a patent is made before a notary public, his certificate of such acknowledgment, under his hand and seal, shall be taken as prima facie evidence of its execution; and while it is true that this act did not take effect until January 1, 1898, yet it will be observed that the act does not say that it shall only be applicable to acknowledgments taken after that date. It is a statute which was intended to declare the evidential effect to be given to acknowledgments before a notary, after a given date, without special reference, however, to the time when the acknowledgment was taken; and in the absence of any specific provision that it should only apply to acknowledgments taken subsequently to January 1, 1898, we perceive no sufficient reason why it should be limited in its operation to acknowledgments so taken." Lanyon Zinc Co. v. Brown, 115 Fed. 150, 154 [aff 119 Fed. 918, 56 CCA 448 (certiorari den 187 U. S. 646 mem, 23 SCt 846 mem, 47 L. ed. 347 mem)]. (2) "The defendant contends that 'shall be acknowledged' [as used in the statute] means thereafter acknowledged, and excludes acknowledgments made before; but these words seem to me to refer to the time when the acknowledgment is produced in evidence, rather than to the time when it is taken, and that if it shall then appear to be so acknowledged it will be sufficient." De Laval assignment of a patent,[83] and the genuineness of the assignor's signature may be proved otherwise.[84] Acknowledgment under the statute dispenses with proof of the execution and genuineness of an assignment,[85] but the statute does not make a certified copy of an assignment of a patent prima facie proof of its execution or genuineness.[86] Although it has been held that an assignment of a patent by a corporation is not sufficiently executed if a state statute providing for corporate acknowledgments has not been complied with,[87] generally state statutes governing acknowledgments are not applicable to acknowledgments of transfers of patents,[88] and an acknowledgment good at common law is sufficient under the patent law.[89] An acknowledgment before a United States consular officer is sufficient under the statute.[90] The acknowledgment of an assignment of a patent relates to the date of the assignment.[91]

[§ 385] 8. Assignment after Expiration of Patent. An assignment of a patent after the patent has expired is, of course, a nullity so far as the transfer of a monopoly is concerned, but such assignment will operate as a transfer to the assignee of the right to sue for past infringements.[92] Such an assignment need not be recorded.[93]

[§ 386] 9. Construction and Operation[94]—a. Construction in General. Assignments and grants of patent rights are subject to the same rules of construction as other contracts.[95]

[a] Before congress enacted the present provision of the patent law in 1897 it was variously held: (1) That where under a state statute the assignment of a patent duly acknowledged before a notary is sufficiently proved, it was not necessary to prove the signature of the assignor. [§ 387] b. Warranties[96]—(1) Express. The assignor may bind himself by express warranties as to his title; the validity and the utility of the patent, and the rights and liabilities of the parties will, in such case, be determined by the terms of the contract.[97] The assignor may also make an express warranty against infringement.[98] An express warranty of title in an assignment of a void patent is a nullity, there being nothing for it to operate upon.[99] In an action by the assignee on an express warranty that the invention is original and novel, the fact that the patent was issued is not conclusive against plaintiff.[1]

[§ 388] (2) Implied. The assignment of a patent carries an implied warranty of title and a right to sell in the assignor,[2] unless the instrument purports to convey only what title the assignee had.[3] There is also an implied warranty that the patent has issued in due form.[4] But there is no implied warranty that the patent is valid,[5] or that the invention does not infringe prior patents.[6] The assignor of a patent does not impliedly agree that he will not compete with the assignee in the sale of an article similar to that covered by the patent, nor produce or sell anything that may serve as a substitute therefor.[7]

[§ 389] c. Estoppel.[8] The assignor of a patent is estopped from disputing the validity or utility of the patent as against his assignee,[9] and this although the patent may be void as to the rest of the world;[10] and he is estopped from demanding such a construction of the patent as to render it valueless,[11] or to deny his own construction of the patent,[12] especially where such construction was employed to induce the sale.[13] Too, the assignor is estopped from defeating the right of his assignee by purchasing or obtaining control of an older patent for the same invention.[14] Further, the assignor cannot derogate from his own grant, and thus he is estopped to deny

[a] Guaranty of peaceable possession.—(1) A contract, reciting, "I further guarantee the said S. peaceable possession of the 'rights' to said patent and invention in said L. county and all the expenses which may be incurred for suits for infringements or for ousting or keeping out present contractors within said territory," is not void on its face because the word "guarantee" in the connection used is meaningless. Bailey v. Miller, 45 Ind. A. 475, 91 NE 24. (2) Such a contract does not stipulate for peaceable possession of the territory named, but for peaceable possession of the "rights" to such patent, hence the assignee could not recover for profits made in the county through infringements by others than the assignor. Bailey v. Miller, supra.

[b] Validity warranted.—An assignment containing language importing that both parties understood they were dealing with a real right secured under a valid patent, and that their mutual covenants were based on this assumption, is to be construed as warranting the validity of the patent. his title,[15] or to claim title as against his assignee,[16] as is a legatee of the assignor where the assignments had been executed but not recorded.[17] However, the assignor is generally not estopped to deny infringement or to show that the patent is limited in its scope;[18] and the assignor of a patent is not estopped by the assignment from taking out a patent for an improvement upon the invention.[19]

Of assignee. An assignee of a patent who has acted under the assignment is estopped to deny the validity of the patent.[20] But he may not be estopped to assert a failure of consideration due to the worthlessness of the patented device.[21]

[§ 390] d. Rights and Interests Conveyed[22]—(1) In General. Generally an assignment of a patent vests in the assignee a title to so much of the patent itself,[23] and transfers to the assignee an exclusive right to do everything under the patent which the patentee himself could do.[24] But an inventor, by assigning one patent, does not give the assignee the right to inquire into applications pending in the patent office for other patents.[25] The assignee acquires by the assignment only such title and rights as his assignor had, subject to all existing equities, conditions, and limitations of which he had actual or constructive notice.[26] The assignee of a patent

Eng.—Werderman v. Société Générale d'Electricité, 19 Ch. D. 246.

[a] Limitations in patent.—(1) Where it appears that the patentee admitted in the patent office that one of his claims as presented was old by a reference to another patent, and, to avoid the reference, inserted a non-patentable limitation, his assignee is bound by such action. Computing Scale Co. v. Automatic Scale Co., 26 App. (D. C.) 238 [aff 204 U. S. 609, 27 SCt 307, 51 L. ed. 645]. (2) Where a patentee is shown not to have been merely an improver, he is entitled to such recognition as his contribution to the art warrants, and his assignees to protection to the same extent, subject, however, to such limitations, if any, as either permitted to be imposed upon the grant, as disclosed by the file wrapper and contents of the application upon which the patent issued. Computing Scale Co. v. Automatic Scale Co., supra.

[b] Unassignable right.—Under a shop license granted by patentees to complainant for the term of the patents, with the sole right to maintain infringement suits and a limited right to grant licenses, reserving to patentees only the right "to themselves make, use, and sell the inventions," such reserved right was not assignable and did not pass by an assignment of the patents which merely transferred patentee's title and the right to royalties. Webster Electric Co. v. Podlesak, 255 Fed. 907.

[c] Prior contracts including rejected claims.—A corporation, taking an assignment of an inventor's rights under a patent knowing that such inventor has contracted with another for exclusive rights therein, cannot claim to be entitled to manufacture and sell an article based on claims in the specifications of which the patent was not granted. Oscar Barnett Fdy. Co. v. Ironworks Co., 81 N. J. Eq. 412, 87 A 160.

[d] The assignee of several distinct patents has no greater right than his several assignors respectively. Washburn, etc., Mfg. Co. v. Griesche, 16 Fed. 669, 5 McCrary 246.

[e] What constitutes notice.—(1) An assignee of a patent is chargeable with notice of every fact in relation to an outstanding interest the possible existence of which is indicated by the recitals of the assignment. Jonathan Mills Mfg. Co. v. Whitehurst, 72 Fed. 496, 19 CCA 130; Waterman v. Shipman, 55 Fed. 982, 5 CCA 371; Prime v. Brandon Mfg. Co., 19 F. Cas. No. 11,421, 4 Bann. & A. 379, 16 Blatchf. 453. (2) Information given by S to defendants prior to assigning to them a patentable invention charges them with notice of his contract with complainant to work on such inventions, and to assign to the latter any patentable invention or improvement S might make thereon. Thompson v. Automatic Fire Protection Co., 211 Fed. 120, 128 CCA 22 [aff 197 Fed. 750]. (3) A purchaser of an invention for which an application for a patent is pending, with knowledge that the inventor had ordinarily takes subject to licenses previously granted by the assignor,[27] and there is authority that he must inform himself of prior licenses as best he can, at his own risk.[28] But the assignment does transfer to the assignee all the rights remaining in the assignor.[29] Where the owner of a patent has assigned all his interest, a subsequent assignment by him is a nullity, and the second assignee acquires no right to the patent,[30] unless the first assignee had abandoned his rights under the contract, in which case a subsequent assignment conveys a perfect title.[31] An assignment of an invention or patent, or interest therein, will pass only the specific right, title, or interest described in the conveyance.[32] An assignment of all the grantor's right, title, and interest in and to a certain patent carries only the existing interest of the grantor at the time of the assignment.[33] Still, words restricting the grant to such patents as the grantor "holds in his own right" do not exclude patents of which his tenure is not exclusive.[34]

Construction of patent between parties.[35] As between assignor and assignee a patent will not be unnecessarily construed so narrowly as to make it worthless;[36] rather the patent must be construed liberally enough to give full value thereto, and to exclude the assignor from every structure within the fair meaning of the claim.[37] Where one, who was no novice in the patent business, assigned an application for a patent, no fine line will be drawn in his favor, as against the assignee, between claims as allowed and those originally made upon the description and drawings.[38]

Time when assignment takes effect. Since the acknowledgment of an assignment of a patent[39] relates back to the date of the assignment,[40] title passes as of the date of the assignment, and not on the date of the acknowledgment.[41]

assigned a previous invention of a similar character to others by an assignment which was recorded, is put upon inquiry and cannot rely on statements of the assignor as to what was covered by the prior assignment. Electric Storage Battery Co. v. Gould Storage Battery Co., 197 Fed. 745 [aff 204 Fed. 280, 122 CCA 478]. (4) A corporation, taking an assignment of an inventor's rights under a patent at a time subsequent to a decision in a suit against such inventor for breach of a contract for exclusive rights in such patent, is chargeable under the facts with notice of all the rights accruing under the prior contract. Oscar Barnett Fdy. Co. v. Ironworks Co., 81 N. J. Eq. 412, 87 A 160. (5) Where the facts of which the assignee of a patent knew and those which it was chargeable with the duty of finding out plainly pointed to the probable existence of a right or title in conflict with that which it was about to buy, the failure to make reasonable inquiry deprived it of the status of a bona fide purchaser without notice. Rogers v. Adams, 119 Misc. 77, 195 NYS 772 [aff 206 App. Div. 739 mem, 199 NYS 947 mem]. (6) The assignee is chargeable with notice of outstanding equities suggested by the recitals of the assignment. Jonathan Mills Mfg. Co. v. Whitehurst, 72 Fed. 496, 19 CCA 130.

[f] Extraordinary interpretation of terms of prior contract.—Where a contract for the assignment of certain patents included inventions of a similar nature which the patentee might thereafter complete, the assignee of a subsequent invention not conceived by the party at the time such contract was executed, although with actual knowledge of such previous assignments, was not chargeable with notice that the word "complete" was intended to be given an extraordinary interpretation to include inventions then conceived. ventions.[42] An assignment of the patent does not of itself pass the right to future improvements,[43] unless the assignor attempts to defeat the assignee's rights by securing patents for a pretended improvement.[44] Still, an assignment may be made to transfer improvements by the use of apt words.[45] In order to have this effect it must plainly appear from the language used that such was the intention of both parties.[46] However, no rule of strict construction applies to such a covenant.[47] A change increasing the economy or efficiency of the existing patent for the purpose for which it is intended constitutes an improvement thereon within the meaning of covenants of the character under consideration.[48] An assignment of a patent with future improvements includes only improvements on the particular machine secured by the patent, not unrelated inventions.[49] Whether the assignment of a patent with improvements includes nonpatentable improvements or is confined to those which are patentable depends upon a construction of the contract between the parties in the light of all the surrounding circumstances.[50] An assignment of all right, title, and interest in an improvement of an invention already patented conveys no interest in the original patent.[51] not for the same machine.[52] The assignee of an agreement transferring a patent with all future inventions relating thereto succeeds to all of the assignor's rights under the contract.[53] Such an assignment includes only inventions within the terms of the contract between the parties.[54]

[§ 392] (3) Rights in Extended Term.[55] In the absence of a specific provision in an assignment of letters patent granting rights in the extended term, the assignment does not carry with it an interest in a subsequently extended term;[56] no right in an extension will be implied in favor of the assignee.[57] But the operation of an assignment is not limited to the term specified in the patent where the instrument contains apt words to show that the parties intended that its operation should be more comprehensive.[58] The extent to which an assignee may enjoy the benefits of an extended term of a patent depends entirely upon the stipulations of the contract.[59] Where the conveyance is of the invention, before the issue of letters patent therefor, the assignee is entitled, unless the instrument of assignment shows a different intention, to obtain a renewal at the expiration of the original term.[60] A conveyance transferring rights in the extended term to the assignee becomes operative upon the grant of the extension.[61]

[§ 393] (4) Rights in Reissue.[62] Where after assignment a patent is reissued, the rights of the assignee are the same under a reissued patent as under the original.[63] But the assignee must consent to or ratify such reissue.[64] An agreement by the assignor of a patent to join in the signing of any lawful and proper application for reissue at the request of the assignee does not require the assignor to sign an application which obviously would be rejected by the patent office, nor one which would necessitate a false oath.[65]

[§ 394] (5) After-Acquired Title.[66] Where an instrument of transfer is made when the assignor has no title, an after-acquired title inures to the benefit of the assignee.[67] But where the assignor had parted with his entire interest to another before the assignment, thus rendering the second assignment a nullity,[68] a subsequent reassignment by the first assignee to the assignor does not inure to the benefit of the second assignee.[69]

[§ 395] (6) Rights of Action for Past Infringement. The assignee of a patent does not acquire a right of action for past infringement unless so speci-

[a] Title to patent cannot be split up.—A court cannot split up the title to a patent, and a complainant is not entitled to a decree requiring a patent to be transferred to him, where it contains claims to which he has established no right, even though he may be entitled to the broad invention by reason of a prior assignment of a patent for an invention in the same field. Gould Storage Battery Co. v. Electric Storage Battery Co., 192 Fed. 28, 112 CCA 416 [certiorari den 223 U. S. 730 mem, 32 SCt 527 mem, 56 L. ed. 634 mem].

[a] Transfer of inventions to be completed.—In an assignment of all inventions which might thereafter be completed, the word "completed" was not used in the sense of "conceived;" but should be construed to mean the finishing or perfection of something already commenced. Davis, etc., Temperature Controlling Co. v. Tagliabue, 159 Fed. 712, 86 CCA 466.

[b] Inventions not included in contract.—A contract for the assignment of all paper-feeding mechanism during the life of a patent assigned by such contract for a similar mechanism to be attached to an existing press of specified type does not require the assignment of a paper-feeding mechanism, invented and designed as an integral part of a newly invented press of a different type. Miller Saw-Trimmer Co. v. Cheshire, 172 Wis. 278, 178 NW 855.

[c] Estoppel.—Where plaintiff had a contract with defendant whereby the latter was to assign future patents for paper-feeding mechanism to plaintiff, the refusal of plaintiff to assist defendant in developing a subsequent invention of a printing press did not estop plaintiff from claiming the right to the patent for the feeding mechanism on the new press, where the model exhibited to plaintiff showed no such mechanism, and plaintiff had no knowledge that defendant would embody such mechanism in his new press. fied in the assignment.[70] But when the assignment includes, expressly or impliedly, all claims for past infringements, the assignee may sue therefor,[71] although there is authority to the contrary.[72] Mere intention, however, not signified in the assignment, to include therein claims for infringements previously committed, will not suffice to invest the assignee with any title to those claims.[73]

Conveyances of patent rights pendente lite do not affect the litigation, the courts being careful to protect the rights of the parties.[74] In such case, however, notice of the transfer should be given to defendant in order that he may not pay the wrong party.[75]

[§ 396] (7) Rights of Action for Future Infringement. Damages and profits for future infringements are incident to and accompany a patent on its assignment, unless separated by an express reservation.[76]

[§ 397] e. Conditions, Covenants, and Restrictions.[77] Conditions precedent in an assignment of a patent must be performed before an assignment will become operative.[78] But conditions in an assignment do not prevent it from operating as an absolute assignment where they are conditions subsequent.[79] For nonperformance of conditions, a forfeiture may be enforced; but, in the case of a condition subsequent, the title which had theretofore vested remains in the assignee until the forfeiture is enforced.[80] If it is so stipulated by the parties, however, the title will revert to the assignor by operation of law, upon the event of a condition subsequent.[81] A clause providing for forfeiture in such case will be strictly construed in favor of the assignee.[82] In the absence of express agreement, there can be no forfeiture for mere nonpayment of royalties which are the consideration for an assignment.[83] Forfeitures are not favored, and any inconsistent acts or dealings will be regarded as a waiver.[84]

Covenants and restrictions.[85] The operation and effect of covenants and restrictions contained in an assignment of a patent depend upon the construction of the language of the covenant in each particular case.[86]

signees and Grantees[87]—(1) In General. In the absence of express contract the assignee of a patent assumes no affirmative obligation to make good the previous contracts of his assignor,[88] but he may do so by express contract,[89] in which case the invalidity of the patent is no defense to actions against him on the contract.[90] The purchaser of a patent is chargeable with the laches of his vendor as to the assertion of claims in the patent office.[91]

[§ 399] (2) Liability for Consideration.[92] In the absence of fraud or warranty the assignee of a patent right cannot refuse to make the payments agreed upon merely because the patent is found to be invalid,[93] or because the patented device infringes another patent;[94] but he may refuse where there is a total failure of consideration flowing from the assignor, as where the patented device is inoperative, useless, and wholly valueless.[95] But in order to sustain the defense of want of consideration it is not enough that the practical utility of the patent be limited, or that the manufactured article cannot be manufactured and sold at a profit, if it be capable of use.[96] A breach of a warranty given on the sale of a patent right is equivalent to a failure of consideration and furnishes a good defense to an action for the price.[97] Where the assignor represents that a patent has been issued, and no patent has in fact been issued, the assignee may defend an action for the price on the ground of failure of consideration.[98] The rule that a purchaser of personalty cannot defend an action for the purchase price on the ground that the vendor had no title, as long as he remains in possession and is not evicted by a paramount title,[99] does not apply to a sale of a patent or an interest therein, as a patent is intangible and incorporeal in its nature,[1] and the vendee cannot be said to be in possession, so that the reason for the rule ceases.[2] The agreement between the parties may require performance of conditions precedent to the creation of the assignee's liability for the purchase money,[3] but the assignee cannot refuse to pay the agreed consideration where nonperformance of such [a] Warranty of validity.—Where a court of competent authority has declared a patent void, and has enjoined the manufacture and sale of the article patented, the purchaser of the patent may defend an action for the price on the ground of want of consideration, where the contract between the parties is construed to warrant the validity of the patent. [a] Rule applied.—Contract for sale of patent required decision by buyers that invention was practical as a condition precedent to any liability on their part. Peck v. Edwards, 90 Conn. 669, 98 A 325.

[b] Sale of securities.—Payment of the purchase price may be conditioned on the obtaining of money from the sale of the securities of a projected corporation to be formed by the transferees. Jones v. Boardman, 148 Md. 147, 128 A 752.

[c] Liability conditioned on existence of profits.—(1) Where defendants contracted with plaintiff that they would at their own expense apply for a patent for an article invented by plaintiff, and, as soon as a patent was issued and a satisfactory practical demonstration had, would pay plaintiff five hundred dolconditions is due to the assignee's own conduct,[4] or is not due to any default of the assignor.[5] The event of conditions upon which the assignee's agreement to pay the agreed consideration is based fixes his liability therefor,[6] and he cannot then avoid payment on the ground of defects in the assignor's title in the absence of an express warranty of title.[7] Where before the issuance of letters patent an inventor assigned his right, but the assignment was refused recordation in the patent office, and the patent issued in the name of the inventor, who made no claim to it and offered to convey to the assignee, the latter cannot defeat an action for the purchase money.[8] Where a patent is issued, the fact that it was not issued when contemplated by the parties will not constitute a defense to an action for the purchase price.[9] The assignee's liability to pay a stipulated consideration periodically continues as long as the agreement remains in force.[10] An agreement to pay the assignor an "annuity" to continue during the life of the patent does not limit such payment to the life of the assignor, and the assignee is liable therefor after the assignor's death to his personal representatives as long as the patent remains in force.[11]

[§ 400] (3) Right to Return of Consideration Paid. Since no warranty of validity is implied in the sale of a patent right,[12] the purchaser of such a right cannot, in the absence of fraud, and without an express covenant, recover of his vendor the price paid for it, because it is found to be invalid.[13]

But under the implied warranty that a patent has been issued in due form,[14] the assignee may recover back the purchase money paid where no patent had in fact been issued at the time of the assignment.[15] And he may recover back the purchase money if the patent right was not that which he agreed to buy,[16] unless he has accepted a deed describing the patent.[17] If a patentee elects to rescind a contract of sale for nonpayment of the whole purchase price, the vendee is entitled to recover back the amount paid on the contract.[18]

Fraud.[19] The assignee of a patent has a right to recover the purchase money paid for the transfer lars, and the profits on the patented article sold until he had received twenty-five hundred dollars, for his invention, and they made two applications for a patent, both of which were rejected, but one of defendants subsequently obtained a patent for a similar article, and not profits were made from its sale, however, and it proved commercially a failure, in an action on the contract by plaintiff, claiming that such patent embodied his invention, there can be no recovery beyond five hundred dollars, because further payment was contingent on the making of profits. Childs v. Le Brocq, 178 Fed. 719, 102 CCA 211. (2) A patentee, suing a manufacturer for the amount due under a contract to assign a future patent, giving the patentee a specified per cent of the "net amount realized," was not entitled to recover under stipulation of facts that the manufacturer "did not make or realize any profit," the words "net amount realized" meaning "net profits." Sparks v. Gus V. Brecht Butchers' Supply Co., (Mo. A.) 225 SW 1022.

[d] Condition that seller work for buyer.—Where it was an essential condition of a contract of sale of a patent right that the seller work for the buyers in the manufacture of the patented article, but he breached his contract, and the buyers could not get the requisite skilled service, and the project failed, the seller cannot recover the purchase money. Rentz v. Hurst, 157 Minn. 81, 195 NW 771.

[e] Delivery of original letters patent.—A provision in a contract for the sale of a patent, requiring the delivery of the original letters patent, is material, and their delivery or tender is a condition precedent to the creation of any liability of the purchaser for the purchase price. Paine v. Parkhurst, 205 Fed. 740, 126 CCA 195.

[f] Tender of conveyance.—One suing for the balance due under an agreement for the sale of patent rights must show a tender of a conveyance of the rights as agreed in order to recover. Strauss v. Brier, 57 Colo. 65, 140 P 183.

[g] Option to pay or reassign.—Where, in consideration of the assignment to him by plaintiff of an interest in a patent, defendant bound himself to pay plaintiff a thousand dollars before the end of the next year "or reassign the patent," the year having elapsed without payment, and defendant having, a few days thereafter, on the money being demanded, offered to reassign, no action lies against him upon his obligation to recover the thousand dollars, for, by its terms, he had the option during the whole year to pay the price, and, upon his failure to do so within that time, plaintiff's only remedy was to compel the reassignment, or, in case of refusal, to recover whatever might be its value. Manvel v. Holdredge, 45 N. Y. 151.

Adamson v. Alexander Milburn Co., 275 Fed. 148.

[a] Illustrations.—A purchaser who had agreed to pay a cash consideration for patent rights and rights under a pending application and future improvements conceived by the inventor, on the agreement of his attorneys as to the breadth and patentability of the claims, could not withhold payment on the plea that the condition precedent had not been complied with, if the attorneys had, without reason, refused to examine into the merits or had withheld their assent on fictitious or unreasonable grounds. Adamson v. Alexander Milburn Co., 275 Fed. 148. (2) A purchaser in such case could not withhold payment on the plea that the condition precedent had not been complied with, if the attorneys had without reason refused to examine into the merits or had withheld their assent on fictitious or unreasonable grounds. [§ 401] 10. Transfer by Succession or Inheritance.[21] Upon the death of the patentee the patent vests in the administrator or executor and not in the heirs.[22]

[§ 402] 11. Actions[23]—a. To Recover Consideration for Transfer. General rules[24] govern the sufficiency of the complaint in an action to recover the consideration for the assignment of a patent.[25]

Evidence. General rules apply[26] as to the admissibility[27] and as to the weight and sufficiency[28] of evidence in actions to recover the consideration for the transfer of a patent.

Instructions.[29] An instruction which states the issues, theories, and defenses raised by the evidence is sufficient.[30]

Questions for jury.[31] In actions to recover the consideration for the assignment of a patent, questions of fact are for the jury.[32]

[§ 403] b. For Damages. Either party to the assignment of a patent may recover damages for a breach of a condition or covenant.[33] An action may be brought against assignors jointly, although separate notes have been given to them for their shares of the purchase price.[34] A sale of a void patent right upon false representations that it is valid is a fraud for which an action will lie.[35]

Questions for jury. In an action for damages for breach of contract for the transfer of a patent, questions of fact are for the jury.[36]

Damages. In a tort action for damages for defendant's wrongful appropriation of plaintiff's invention, based upon defendant's having secured a patent for an invention embodying plaintiff's invention which had been the subject of a prior agreement between the parties as to its transfer, the measure for the buyer, is sufficient as against defendant's contention that the court failed to charge breach of an implied warranty where there was no evidence to sustain such contention. Leese v. Bernard Gloekler Co., 287 Pa. 295, 135 A 206.

20. Spicer v. Hurley, 161 Cal. 1, 118 P 249.

[a] Illustrations.—(1) Approval of an application for a patent is not the equivalent of a patent granted and issued as represented by the assignor in a contract for the sale of an interest in a patent granted and issued, the term "patented" meaning the actual issuance of a patent by the government; and the assignor's representations are therefore false. Spicer v. Hurley, 161 Cal. 1, 118 P 249. (2) In such case the fact that subsequent to the rescission and the action patents have been actually granted does not affect the buyer's right. Spicer v. Hurley, supra. (3) In such case, the fact that under the bill of sale the buyer acquired an interest recognized in equity did not preclude him from recovering the price paid. Spicer v. Hurley, supra.

[b] Complaint held sufficient.—(1) In an action on a contract obligating plaintiff to assign to defendant, on request, "all inventions and letters patent" obtained by plaintiff which may be useful in defendant's business, and requiring defendant to pay plaintiff one half the net profits arising from the sale of goods manufactured under the patents, a complaint which alleges that plaintiff assigned the patents, and that defendants used them, and made net profits by such use, is sufficient, without also alleging an assignment of "all inventions," since the court cannot assume that defendant requested their assignment, and that plaintiff refused. Dalzell v. Fahy's Watch Case Co., 138 N. Y. 285, 33 NE 1071. (2) An allegation that the patents were assigned to "defendant, or for its use," shows a sufficient compliance with the contract requiring the assignment to be made to defendant, where it is further alleged that the assignment was made at defendant's request. Dalzell v. Fahy's Watch Case Co., supra.

[c] Complaint held not to state cause of action.—Where a complaint alleged an assignment of a patent by intestate to defendant's assignor in consideration of such assignor's agreement to pay intestate in each year, while the patent should remain in force, a certain annuity, and that defendant had succeeded to all the property of its assignor, including the patent, and had assumed all its obligations, which it fulfilled during intestate's life, but had since refused, but failed to allege any contract between intestate and defendant, it did not state a cause of action. Fraud as basis for:

Recovery of consideration paid see supra § 400.

Rescission see infra § 405.

36. See cases infra this note.

[a] Questions held for jury.—(1) In an action for breach of contract to pay plaintiffs a cash consideration for patent rights and rights under a pending application and future improvements conceived by the inventor, on an agreement by defendant's attorneys as to the breadth and patentability of the claims, the question whether the attorneys had in fact agreed as to the breadth and patentability of the claims is held for the jury. Adamson v. Alexander Milburn Co., 275 Fed. 148. (2) In such an action the question of whether a sufficient time had elapsed for the attorneys to make the necessary investigations and agree as to the breadth and patentability of the claims is for the jury. Adamson v. Alexander Milburn Co., supra. (3) In such an action, the question of whether there was such a failure in the breadth and patentability of the claims as would not protect the purchaser of the patent in the manufacture, sale, and use of damages is the value of plaintiff's invention.[37] In such an action the price fixed by the parties in the agreement is not evidence of the actual value of the invention.[38]

[§ 404] c. Equitable Relief[39]—(1) In General. A corporation which takes an assignment of a patent and proceeds to manufacture and sell the patented invention with knowledge of a prior contract for exclusive rights under the patent with another is liable for an accounting for profits.[40] Where the allegations of a complaint are insufficient to state a cause of action at law to recover the consideration for the transfer of a patent,[41] they may nevertheless be sufficient to entitle plaintiff to a decree in equity for payment of the amount due.[42]

[§ 405] (2) Rescission and Cancellation[43]—(a) For Fraud. In the absence of warranty equity can give no relief to the assignee of a patent found to be void unless fraud is shown.[44] But an assignment or contract for the sale of a patent or interest therein may be rescinded or canceled for fraud.[45] To rescind a contract of sale of a patent right on the ground of false and fraudulent representations, such representations must have been of material facts, constituting an inducement to the contract, whereon the other party had a right to rely, and did rely, and was thereby misled to his injury.[46] Mere circumstantial differences between the patent right and the description of it in the conveyance are immaterial, and raise no presumption of fraud.[47] Further fraudulent representations, in order to afford a ground for relief, must be of facts then existing or preëxisting, as distinguished from an opinion,[1] a promise, or an assumed future fact. Furthermore, these facts must be of a concrete character, as distinguished from a truth or principle.[48] Mere promises or predictions,[49] or misrepresentations amounting to mere trade talk,[50] are not sufficient basis for relief. Representations by the seller of a patent that it is valid and does not interfere with any prior patent must be regarded as matters of opinion, and not as statements of fact,[51] unless it appears that there was a prior patent covering the identical invention, and that the seller was aware thereof.[52] So a statement that letters patent are new and useful, if untrue, is not cause for avoiding a sale of the letters made in reliance on such statement.[53] Nor is a mere false assertion of value, when no warranty is intended, ground of relief to a purchaser, because the assertion is matter of opinion.[54] But a gross misrepresentation of the capacity of a machine and the success in selling and operating it, of which the purchaser was ignorant, has been held sufficient to warrant the rescission of a contract induced thereby.[55]

Procedure.[56] A contract of assignment will not be rescinded without an allegation of fraud or offer to return the consideration, or other ground justifying equitable interposition.[57]

Parties. All persons interested in the suit should be made parties thereto.[58]

Evidence. General rules[59] apply as to the admissibility and as to the weight and sufficiency of evidence.[60]

[§ 406] (b) For Breach of Covenant or Condition.[61] A party to an assignment may maintain a suit in equity to rescind or cancel the transfer upon the other party's breach of a covenant or condition where there are equitable grounds for relief.[62] A patentee may, by his acquiescence, estop himself to claim the cancellation of an assignment.[63]

Pleading.[64] A bill to rescind the transfer of a patent for breach of a covenant must allege grounds for equitable relief.[65] Where plaintiff alleges readiness to perform all terms and conditions of the agreement, his failure in his complaint formally to offer to refund whatever sum may be found to be due from him in restoration of a status quo between the parties is immaterial.[66]

[§ 407] (3) Injunction.[67] An injunction will not issue in the absence of proof of grounds for equitable relief.[68] A preliminary injunction will not be decreed where it would cause irreparable damage to defendant,[69] but the court may, on motion for a preliminary injunction, grant whatever relief the equities of the situation demand.[70] The owner of an undivided interest in a patent[71] cannot maintain a suit to restrain another part owner from manufacturing thereunder or from authorizing others to do so.[72] An assignee who proceeds to manufacture and sell the patented invention, knowing that the inventor has contracted for the exclusive rights under the patent with another, may be enjoined at the instance of the parties to the prior contract.[73]

[§ 408] C. Licenses*[74]—1. In General. A license is any right to make, use, or sell the patented invention which is less than an undivided part interest in the patent itself.[75] A grant of the rights to

Dow v. Harkin, 67 N. H. 383, 29 A 846. (2) The assignor is entitled to a rescission of the contract in equity, where the assignee failed to make practical use of the apparatus for five years after the making of the contract, under an absolute covenant to do so, there being no rational rule of damages in such case. [a] Illustrations.—(1) An inventor, who sold his right in a patent for a connector to his brother with the understanding that this latter would form a company to exploit, protect, defend, and introduce his invention, and who complains that his brother, defendant, entered into direct competition with him in the manufacture and exploitation of a competitive connector, imperiling his rights, cannot obtain an injunction for the purpose of preventing defendant from violating the agreement entered into with him and restraining him from organizing and doing any act to promote the new invention to plaintiff's prejudice if he has not proved and established: First, the merits of his invention; second, that a patent has been issued to protect his invention; third, that defendant is not in a position to obtain a patent for his own invention and to exploit it. Robinson v. Robinson, 33 Que. K. B. 180. (2) Where plaintiffs and defendant entered into an agreement in writing for the assignment by defendant to plaintiff of all his rights in a gold separator of which he was the inventor, upon receiving a certain number of shares in a company to be organized for the purpose of obtaining a patent for the separator and for other purposes in connection therewith, and prior to the incorporation of the company a patent obtained in Canada was assigned to plaintiffs, and an action was brought for an injunction to prevent defendant from dealing, as his own, with a patent obtained in the United States, and which was included within the terms of the agreement, the obligation to transfer the invention on the one side and to allot the shares on the other are concurrent conditions, and plaintiffs have no right to ask for a transfer of the invention until they were ready to deliver the shares. Sutherland v. Westhaver, 39 N. S. 52, 1 EastLR 102. (3) In such case, in the absence of any indication of readiness or willingness on the part of plaintiffs to perform their part of the agreement, they were not in a position to come into a court of equity and ask for an injunction against defendant to restrain him from selling the American patent, or for a declaration as to their interest in it. make, use, and sell will constitute an assignment of the patent;[76] but any or all of these rights may be granted separately,[77] and no more than a mere license will be given by a grant of the right to make,[78] use,[79] or sell;[80] or to make and use, but not to sell;[81] or to use and sell, but not make,[82] or to make and sell, but not use;[83] and a grant of all three rights will convey no more than a license when their exercise is restricted to a specified purpose,[84] or for a limited time on payment of royalty,[85] or subject to rights previously granted;[86] and the same is true of a grant of an exclusive right within a certain territory with a reservation to the grantor of the right to make[87] or sell articles of his own manufacture therein,[88] or a reservation of the right to make and sell for export to foreign countries,[89] or reservation of the right to revoke the grant.[90]

[§ 409] 2. Who May Grant. A true license can be granted only by one who owns or has an interest in the patent.[91]

A license granted by one coöwner of a patent is valid as against the licensor and his coöwners,[92] and the licensee is liable to the licensor for the agreed price,[93] but he is not liable to the other coöwners,[94] unless otherwise stipulated.[95] Nor can the coöwners recover such sum from the licensor,[96] in the absence of an agreement to divide moneys received,[97] although early decisions intimated that such recovery might be had.[98] The licensor must account for royalties obtained by him when obtained by fraud.[99]

The assignee of a patent may, in the absence of stipulations to the contrary in the assignment, grant a valid license.[1]

[§ 410] 3. Creation and Validity in General—a. Express Licenses. The validity of a license is determined by the principles that apply to other contracts.[2] A valid express license may be created by a parol agreement,[3] agreements for the transfer of patent rights not being within the statute of frauds,[4] unless the parties have intended the execution of a formal agreement,[5] and they may waive such a formal agreement, even though they may have provided therefor.[6] If the license is in writing, no particular form is necessary;[7] nor need it be recorded.[8] It must conform to the requirements of state laws,[9] and not be in restraint of trade, or against public policy.[10] A valid license may be given by a covenant not to sue for future infringements.[11] The mere fact that corporate stock of the licensor and licensee corporations is owned by the same stockholders will not invalidate an otherwise valid license.[12] A license of a void patent is validated by the issuance of a second patent for the invention.[13]

License before patent. The license may be given before issuance of the patent,[14] and, if without restrictions, and if acted on by applying the invention to machines or mechanisms constructed before the granting of the patent, will protect the licensee in its use afterward.[15]

Modification or reformation. The contract may be modified by a subsequent agreement between the parties,[16] and may be altered or reformed when it fails to embody the intentions of the parties.[17] In order to obtain reformation, mutual mistake must be shown.[18] Modification will not affect the rights of third persons when they were acquired prior thereto.[19]

Uniformity of licenses. Licenses given to distinct individuals need not contain the same restrictions.[20]

Ont.—Fowell v. Chown, 25 Ont. 71. "An inventor has an inchoate right of property in an invention pending his application for patent, with which he may deal as an article of property." Cook Pottery Co. v. Parker, supra.

[a] Consideration for license before patent.—A license to use an invention pending application for patent thereon is a sufficient consideration for a contract between inventor and licensee whereby the latter may manufacture and place on the market articles of commerce on a royalty basis, and protection of the licensee in the use of the invention when patented forms a part of the consideration for such contract. Cook Pottery Co. v. Parker, 89 W. Va. 7, 109 SE 744.

[b] Sufficient existence of article.—The concrete embodiment of an invention in a machine is a reduction to practice, equivalent to the filing of a specification, for the purposes of a license by the inventor. Keystone Type Fdy. v. Fastpress Co., 272 Fed. 242 [rev 263 Fed. 99].

[c] Estoppel to deny scope of patent.—When a license is given before issuance, on the theory that pending claims, if allowed, would cover the licensee's product, when the patent issues with these claims the licensee cannot deny that it covers the product. [a] Consideration.—A modification agreement providing for a means of ascertainment of royalties was of benefit to the licensor and hence on a sufficient consideration. Goshen Rubber Works v. Single Tube Auto., etc., Tire Co., 166 Fed. 431, 92 CCA 183.

[b] Fraud.—(1) A supplemental agreement by the officers and receivers of a corporation holding a license to make a particular type of bearings under a patent, by which the corporation waived the provision of the original contract prohibiting licenses to others in return for the right to make any type of bearings covered by the patent and for a rebate on the royalties, was not so improvident as to indicate fraud, although a court decision as to the scope of the patent had necessitated procuring licenses by other manufacturers of bearings. Standard Roller Bearing Co. v. Hess-Bright Mfg. Co., 264 Fed. 516 [aff 275 Fed. 916]. (2) A letter by the owner of a patent to the president of a licensee corporation, refusing consent to an assignment of the license, but agreeing to give license to the president or his nominee, was held not to establish fraud by the president in making a supplemental agreement, four months before the letter was written, consenting to licenses to other corporations on terms which were not improvident, and which were known to the majority of the stockholders and directors before the contract was signed. Standard Roller Bearing Co. v. Hess-Bright Mfg. Co., supra.

[c] Effect.—Where the contract has been modified by a subsequent agreement, the licensor cannot take advantage of both contracts. Mouat v. Bamlet, 123 Mich. 345, 82 NW 74.

[d] Provision for modification.—Where a license provides that in case any subsequent license is granted on more favorable terms the licensee may take advantage thereof, the licensee cannot take advantage of the license pending at the time his license was granted which he had knowledge of and which he knew that his licensor was morally bound to grant. or one acting under him.[22] Acquiescence, if founded on a valuable consideration, may amount to a license,[23] but more than mere consent to the use of the patent is necessary.[24] Whether a license will be implied depends on whether or not the circumstances of the case are such as to estop the owner from asserting infringement.[25] A license will not be implied merely from the partnership relation,[26] or where an express contract exists.[27] The attachment of patented machinery to a building so that it becomes a part of the realty[28] has been held not to imply a right of use against the patentee.[29] The question of implied license arising out of the relationship of employer and employee is treated elsewhere in this work,[30] as is the question of the right of the government to the use of inventions.[31]

[§ 412] (2) From Sale of Patented Article. The unrestricted sale of a patented article by anyone having the right to make such sale releases the article sold from the monopoly of the patent,[32] and the purchaser thereof ordinarily acquires the unqualified right to sell[33] or to use the article[34] so long as such use does not violate the vendor's exclusive property in another invention.[35] That the sale may be unrestricted, it must have been made by one having a right to sell.[36]

Sale of parts or elements. The sale of parts of a machine used in a patented process will not imply a license to use the process;[37] nor will the sale of an element of a patented combination imply the right to use the combination,[38] or the sale of parts of a machine as scrap give the right to reassemble and use the machine.[39] A purchaser of parts may, however, have an implied license to make as many of the patented articles as is necessary to use up the parts.[40]

[§ 413] c. Options and Executory Agreements. An option to take a license is supported by a sufficient consideration where the party to whom it is given is bound by it to make required tests of the

[b] License by estoppel.—A single purchase of wrappers such as are used for a patented confection does not render the purchaser a licensee by estoppel as to the patent for the confection where the purchaser is without knowledge that the wrappers bore any patent notice. patent,[41] and such tests, where made by the agreement conditions precedent, must be performed,[42] unless waived.[43] A mere option, not acted upon, will not create a license.[44] An agreement to give a license may be treated in equity as a license,[45] and such agreement may be specifically enforced.[46] A license is not rendered a mere executory agreement for a license by the fact that certain of its terms depend upon the sustaining of the validity of the patent.[47] Where the agreement is to purchase a license upon the construction of a satisfactory sample of work thereunder, the dissatisfaction of the promisor because of the cost of the work is a ground for his refusal to perform notwithstanding the quality of the work is satisfactory.[48]

[§ 414] d. Recording.[49] The law does not require that a license be recorded in the patent office even as against subsequent purchasers.[50]

[§ 415] 4. Construction and Operation—a. In General. The rules applicable to the construction of contracts generally[51] apply to the construction of license agreements.[52] Such contracts will be construed according to the intention of the parties as expressed in the contract[53] as a whole,[54] or as shown by the conduct of the parties where the agreement does not express their true intention,[55] their practical construction being entitled to great weight.[56] The original contract may be construed by the par-

[a] Particular words.—(1) "Interest" construed to mean a limited property right less than an absolute ownership. Copeland v. Eaton, 209 Mass. 139, 95 NE 291, AnnCas1912B 521. (2) "Road" as used in license to use paving material includes railroad crossings and station platforms. Barber Asphalt Pav. Co. v. Headley Good Roads Co., 283 Fed. 236 [new trial granted 284 Fed. 177 (aff 292 Fed. 119)]. (3) "Form" of articles may mean kind and not shape. Macallen Co. v. Johns-Pratt Co., 80 Fed. 410. (4) A contract between the owners of two patents, covering similar inventions, by which joint licenses were to be issued at request of the second party, who was to recover a share of the license fees for the use of the patent of the first party, and also of the "damages" payable from infringers of such patent, does not entitle him to share in a sum recovered by a suit in equity as "profits" realized by an infringer, where no damages were allowed. Wooster v. Trowbridge, 115 Fed. 722 [aff 120 Fed. 667, 57 CCA 129 (certiorari den 190 U. S. 557 mem, 23 SCt 854 mem, 47 L. ed. 1183 mem)]. (5) Where profits are defined by a certain article, all the provisions of which are to apply to the relations between the parties springing into existence after the expiration of the contract "mutatis mutandis," these latter words mean necessary changes in details to conform to a single vital alteration, and suggest a reversal of the relative positions of the parties under the contract, which was to continue the same in other respects. Copeland v. Eaton, 209 Mass. 139, 95 NE 291, Ann Cas1912B 521. (6) Provision giving licensor benefit of any "combination" which licensee might enter included the organization of a company to control licensee's business, the licensee being entitled to representation on the board of directors. Brownsville Glass Co. v. Appert Glass Co., 136 Fed. 240.

[b] Evasion clauses (1) are contractual, although found in the preamble of the written agreement (Pressed Steel Car Co. v. Union Pac. R. Co., 270 Fed. 518 [rev 254 Fed. 316]), (2) and have been construed to mean that the licensee will not resort to colorable differences of construction to escape infringement (Pressed Steel Car Co. v. Union Pac. R. Co., supra).

[c] Implied covenants.—(1) The parties to an exclusive license impliedly agree not to prevent performance of the contract. Gessler v. Erwin Co., 182 Wis. 315, 193 NW 363; Manning v. Galland-Henning Pneumatic Malting Drum Mfg. Co., 141 Wis. 199, 124 NW 291, 18 AnnCas 976. (2) A company having leased to another company a patent owned by it and leased its plant for the manufacture and sale thereof, it was bound not to do any act rendering the lease and patent less beneficial to the other company. National Hollow Brake Beam Co. v. Bakewell, 224 Mo. 203, 123 SW 561.

[d] Severable covenants.—A covenant to pay royalties for a license to use a patented process, the amount to be determined by quarterly statements, is not a severable covenant to render quarterly statements. Jobbins v. Kendall Mfg. Co., 196 Fed. 216.

53. Ruckstell Sales, etc., Co. v. Perfecto Gear Differential Co., 28 F. (2d) 407; Eskimo Pie Corp. v. National Ice Cream Co., 20 F. (2d) 1003 [aff 26 F. (2d) 901]; Westinghouse Electric, etc., Co. v. ties themselves by a supplementary contract,[57] and several licenses constituting one transaction may be construed together.[58] Although the language used is often of great significance in determining whether or not the transfer is a license,[59] the legal effect, and not the name, will determine whether the agreement is a license or an assignment.[60] All previous parol agreements are considered as merged in the written agreement.[61] A written license agreement which is clear and unambiguous cannot be explained by oral or extrinsic evidence,[62] but it may be so explained where it is capable of two interpretations and a doubt exists as to its true meaning.[63] Uncertainty in a contract limiting the usual obligations of the licensor to his licensee is to be resolved in favor of the licensee.[64]

[§ 416] b. Rights and Interests Conveyed—(1) In General. The rights and interests of the parties to a license agreement are to be ascertained from its terms,[65] including the limitations and restrictions which it contains.[66] The patentee may grant a license upon any condition, the performance of which is reasonably within the reward which the patentee by the grant of the letters patent is entitled to secure,[67] and a violation of the condition on which the license has been granted may make the licensee an infringer of the patent.[68] In general, a license conveys the right not to be sued for infringement.[69]

In the absence of stipulations to the contrary the agreement assumes that patents referred to in it are valid according to their respective claims.[70] The licensor can convey no greater title or interest than he possesses,[71] although it has been held that a title subsequently acquired by him will inure to the benefit of his licensee,[72] and the license may, by the express agreement of the parties, operate to transfer subsequently acquired rights.[73] Further, the licensor, in order to be permitted to enforce the license agreement, must be able to transfer the rights which it recites him as possessing.[74] A licensee of an original patent, being the holder of a substantial interest therein, is not bound by a construction placed by the patentee upon his original claims to support his theory that a reissue is necessary.[75]

[§ 417] (2) Exclusive Licenses. A patentee has the right to grant an exclusive license of his patent,[76] and such a license is not illegal as in restraint of trade.[77] In the absence of a provision to the contrary in the license, the licensor may execute other licenses to other licensees,[78] and may grant them at a lower rate;[79] but an exclusive license during its existence prevents the licensor from granting a license to another person.[80] Although the patentee agrees not to issue other licenses, he may nevertheless assign the rights remaining to him.[81]

[§ 418] (3) License to Several. A license given to several individuals gives to each a separate and distinct interest which he may transfer or use without obligation to the others in the absence of a contract controlling the matter.[82]

[§ 419] (4) Rights Necessary to Enjoyment or Use of License—(a) In General. A license to use a patented article in one way will not license a use in another;[88] but generally a license carries with it whatever further license may be necessary to render the granted license effective.[84] Thus an implied right to make a patented article may accompany the grant of the right to use,[85] or use and sell, the article,[86] but not unless the right to use would be of no value without the implied right to make;[87] and a license to sell will not include the right to exchange.[88] A conveyance of the right to make and sell a patented article may include the right to use it,[89] and the right to make may imply the right to sell[90] or use and sell it;[91] and a license to make and use may include the right to sell.[92] A license to make and sell articles of the licensee's manufacture gives him no right to have others manufacture for him.[93]

Use of other patented article. Ordinarily a right to use one patent will not give the user an implied license to make use of some other patent belonging to the licensor;[94] but if the patented article sold to the licensee can be used only in connection or combination with another patented invention of the licensor, a license to use the latter invention may be implied.[95] Nor will the right to use a composition carry the right to use the process.[96]

[§ 420] (b) Right To Repair or Improve Patented Article. A license to use carries with it the right to repair the patented article,[97] or add improvements.[98]

[§ 421] (c) License Implied from Purchase of Patented Article.[99] Although an unrestricted sale gives the licensee the unqualified right to use the patented article,[1] the licensee cannot reconstruct,[2] or make another machine or structure like it,[3] or buy one from an infringer,[4] or use machines other than those purchased from the patentee.[5]

[§ 422] (5) Rights of Licensee as to Competition or Infringement.[6] In the absence of a covenant to protect the licensee against infringers, there is no obligation on the part of the licensor to do so.[7] A mere notice, attached to the article, that the patentee will prosecute infringers is not a covenant or guaranty to protect the purchaser;[8] nor is an agreement to sell exclusively to one person for a certain period.[9] A covenant that the licensor will not license or permit others to use or sell does not amount to a covenant to secure the licensee against unauthorized and unlawful acts of wrongdoers.[10] An agreement to save the licensee harmless against infringement claims does not require the licensor to protect the licensee from competition by infringers.[11] Where the contract stipulates that the patentee shall not be responsible for damages from infringement, the licensee takes the risk.[12]

Competition by licensee. Unless the license so provides, the manufacture of similar articles on other patents not constituting an infringement of the patent as to which the license is granted is not a violation of the license.[13]

[§ 423] (6) Control of Mode of Manufacture. In the absence of a stipulation in the contract, the licensee is required in the construction of the licensed article to use only such materials as are reasonably suitable for the purpose,[14] and the licensor has no right to dictate as to such materials.[15]

[§ 424] (7) Right to Improvements upon Patent. Whether improvements pass under a license depends upon the intention of the parties as evidenced by a proper construction of their agreement.[16] A license to a patent does not in itself carry with it improvements to such patent.[17]

[§ 425] (8) Effect of Limitations upon Third Persons. A purchaser from the licensee having notice of restrictions in the license takes subject to them,[18] unless such restrictions are invalid or illegal,[19] in which case he is not bound, even though he has notice.[20] A purchaser without notice of any private agreements between the patentee and his licensee is not bound thereby.[21]

[§ 426] c. Where License May Be Exercised—(1) Express License. The express terms of the license will control as to the territory in which it may be exercised.[22] A license to use a patented device in a particular territory,[23] or at a particular establishment,[24] is binding on the licensee. But a license to use and sell a machine within a specified territory authorizes the licensee to sell the product of the machine out of such territory.[25] And a license to use a patented device in a particular shop does not prevent its manufacture elsewhere.[26] Exclusive licensees may, by agreement between themselves, limit the territory in which they may operate.[27]

[§ 427] (2) Implied License. A purchaser at an unrestricted sale of a patented article has an unqualified right to use or sell the article,[28] and this, although the purchase was from a territorial assignee for use in another territory;[29] and the vendor's right to sell is not affected by his knowledge of such intended use.[30] The right to sell, as distinguished from the right to use, in the territory of another, was formerly denied;[31] but the later decisions have overruled this doctrine, holding that the sale of patented articles by the patentee or a territorial assignee confers upon the purchasers of such articles the right to carry the same into the territory of another assignee, and there sell them, in the usual course of trade, without the consent or license of the latter assignee.[32] But a purchase of an article patented in a foreign country will not imply a right to sell in another country wherein the article is patented unless the licensee of that country consents to the sale.[33]

[§ 428] d. Duration of License—(1) In General. In the absence of an express provision on the subject a license continues until the expiration of the original term of the patent,[34] but not be-Pennsylvania R. Co., 8 Fed. 45; Lightner v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 15 F. Cas. No. 8,343, 1 Lowell 338). (3) A license to use a patented invention upon the locomotives used by a railroad company on its road or on any road or roads now owned or that may hereafter be owned or operated by such company embraces not only locomotives in use at the date of the license upon roads then owned and operated by the company, but also such other locomotives as it might thereafter use and other roads which it might thereafter operate. Matthew v. Pennsylvania R. Co., supra.

[a] In England (1) it has been held that, where the owner of a patent manufactures and sells the patented article in a foreign country as well as in England, the sale of the article in one country implies a license to use it in the other, but if he has assigned his patent in the other country, the article cannot be sold so as to defeat the rights of the assignee. Betts v. Willmott, L. R. 6 Ch. 239. (2) Where the owner of patents in two countries grants a license to use the patent in one country, there is no implied license to sell the manufactured article in the other country in violation of the licensor's patent in the latter country. yond,[35] and it ordinarily will not embrace an extended term.[36] However, an express stipulation in the contract as to the duration of the license will of course control.[37] If a license for a limited period provides for a renewal, it may be extended by the conduct of the licensee indicating his intention to avail himself of the renewal option,[38] or, if notice is necessary, it may be given orally,[39] and failure to give such notice may be excused.[40]

[§ 429] (2) Extended Terms. Ordinarily a license is limited to the term of the patent,[41] and in the absence of express stipulations an extended term does not inure to the benefit of the licensee.[42] But renewals may be covered by the license by express agreement.[43] Where the ownership of the article does not carry with it the right of use, the owner may use it only during the period covered by the license.[44] A licensee who, having machines in use at the end of an original term of a patent, takes a license for another year under the extended term, waives any rights which he had to use such machines when the first term ended.[45] If, before the extension, the right to use was limited to a particular district or to a specified number of machines, it continues during the extension, subject to the same limitations.[46]

[§ 430] (3) License Implied from Purchase of Patented Article.[47] The right to use, acquired by an unrestricted purchase,[48] continues until the article is worn out;[49] and this, although the term of the patent has been extended.[50] But when the article is worn out or destroyed, the license to use ceases.[51]

[§ 431] 5. Assignments and Sublicenses—a. In General. As a general rule, a license is personal to the licensee, and not transferable,[52] unless the terms

[b] Construction of particular stipulations.—(1) A stipulation in a license that it shall continue "during the term for which said letters patent are or may be granted" (Hodge v. Hudson River R. Co., 12 F. Cas. No. 6,559, 6 Blatchf. 85, 3 Fish. Pat. Cas. 410), (2) or "for the whole term of the patent which may be granted" (Wetherill v. Passaic Zinc Co., 29 F. Cas. No. 17,465, 6 Fish. Pat. [c] Provisions for termination (1) will not invalidate a license. Meurer Steel Barrel Co. v. Martin, 1 F. (2d) 687. (2) Where the contract gave the licensee right to cancel if the device failed "to be commercially successful to the satisfaction" of the licensee, there was no necessary intent that commercial success could be decided only by actual manufacture and commercial sale, the reasonable meaning being that, if the licensee found itself not satisfied within the time limit specified that the device would be a commercial success, it might cancel. Computing Scale Co. v. Barnard Co., 259 Fed. 250, 170 CCA 318. (3) Contract to use machine for certain number of revolutions created a revocable license. Elliott Mach. Co. v. Center, 227 Fed. 124.

[d] Sale of accumulated stock.—A license to make and sell during term of license, royalty to be paid on all sales made before its termination, although delivery was not made until afterward, by implication denies the right to sell after license has been terminated at his election, although the articles sold were made during the term. of the agreement show an intention to permit an assignment.[53] However, it has been held that a license, although not usually transferable, will pass to one who is a successor rather than an assignee of the licensee,[54] and that a mere change of business status will not effect an assignment.[55]

Apportionment. A licensee cannot apportion his rights under the license by assignment,[56] unless a manifest intent to confer such a right appears in the contract of license;[57] and such intent cannot be inferred merely from the grant to him and his "assigns."[58] But where such a license runs to the executors and administrators of the licensees as well as to their assigns, it is apportionable and divisible by assignment, and may be transferred in severalty by one of the licensees.[59]

[§ 432] b. Assent to, or Recognition of, Assignment. Although a license is ordinarily unassignable,[60] the licensor may affirm an assignment by recognizing and dealing with the assignee.[61] Even where a license contains a stipulation that it should be nontransferable, it may be assigned with the assent of the licensor, since such a stipulation is for his sole benefit.[62]

[§ 433] c. Rights and Liabilities of Parties. In the case of an assignment of a license, the assignee takes subject to the terms of the license,[63] and may take all of the rights of the assignor,[64] although no more.[65] It is the duty of the purchaser to inform himself of the nature of the licensee's ownership, and the extent of his right,[66] but he may rescind the

"In the absence of any statutory provision, there is no principle of equity which requires the owner of a patented invention to give notice to a voluntary purchaser of a licensee's right, to enable him to hold such purchaser to the restricted use and enjoyment of the invention stipulated in contract when his purchase was induced by fraud.[67] The licensor, it has been held, is entitled to the licensee's profits under an unauthorized sublicensing agreement,[68] and he may claim damages for an unknown sublicensing.[69] When the assignment is assented to, the licensee cannot be held as a guarantor of his assignee's performance of the conditions of the license.[70]

[§ 434] 6. Termination[71]—a. In General. A license containing no stipulation as to revocation cannot be terminated except by mutual consent,[72] or because of the wrong or default of the party against whom termination is sought.[73] A mere difference as to one or more of the minor terms of a parol license will not justify one of the parties in declaring it rescinded and proceeding as if nothing had been done under it.[74] Where the licensee obtains a cancellation of the license by means of fraud, such cancellation may be set aside.[75]

[§ 435] b. Options To Terminate. A stipulation allowing the licensee to terminate the agreement by notice will, when followed, bring an end to the agreement;[76] but the notice given must be clear and unequivocal,[77] and in accordance with the agreement,[78] unless waived.[79] The licensor does not lose his right to exercise an option to terminate by delay due to his failure to receive information to which he is entitled from the licensee.[80]

[§ 436] c. Fraud or Misrepresentation as Ground. Subject to the rules applicable in the case of contracts generally,[81] the licensee may rescind where he has been induced to enter into the agreement through the fraudulent misrepresentations of the licensor,[82]

the licensee." Chambers v. Smith, supra.

unless the licensee has been guilty of laches[83] or has ratified or affirmed the contract.[84]

Ratification by the patentee after denial of the right of a licensee to confer title upon another, and after such other has for that reason repudiated his contract with the licensee, will not affect the right of such other to rescind for false statements by the licensee as to his ownership and right to grant licenses.[85]

[§ 437] d. Insufficiency or Failure of Consideration as Ground. A license contract may be rescinded because of a total failure of consideration,[86] as where, by reason of the invalidity of the patent and threatened suits for infringement, the purchaser of a patented article or process has been prevented from making use of it.[87] The fact that the licensee paid more than his license was worth will not entitle him to rescind in the absence of fraud.[88] Where a contract conferring the right to manufacture and sell certain machines provides also for the granting of a license under patents to be procured, the failure to procure the patent does not constitute such a failure of consideration as to warrant a rescission of the agreement.[89]

[§ 438] e. Breach of Covenant as Ground. A breach of covenant does not per se work a forfeiture of a license,[90] even though the license contains an express stipulation that it shall do so.[91] It will remain in force so as to defeat a suit against the licensee for infringement until it has been rescinded by decree of a court having jurisdiction.[92] Where the licensor has an adequate remedy at law, equity will not annul the license.[93] Nor will it terminate the license when to do so would be inequitable,[94] or for acts which are not violative of the contract.[95] While breach of a covenant in a license contract may, in a proper case, authorize rescission in equity,[96] there should be clear and satisfactory proof of the grounds,[97] and performance of conditions precedent, if any are imposed by the contract, must be shown.[98]

Notice of forfeiture. An agreement that upon failure of a party to a license to perform his covenant it may be forfeited by a written notice served on him is valid, and may be enforced,[99] although it has been decided that the licensor must resort to a court of equity.[1] The licensor cannot annul the license for such default without giving the notice provided for;[2] and such notice must be a clear and unequivocal revocation.[3] If the licensee continues, after default and notice, to exercise the license, the licensor cannot sue him as an infringer, but must either bring an action at law on the contract for royalty, or sue in equity to have the license annulled.[4] The reservation by the licensor of the right to revoke the license for nonpayment of royalties confers no rights upon the licensee, nor does it take away the licensor's common-law right to enforce the

[a] Time to perform.—Where the licensee is given a period of time, after receipt of preliminary notice of the licensor's intention to terminate because of default, in which to perform the conditions of the agreement, the date of preliminary notice of default does not constitute the date as of which the licensee's rights are to be determined. contract.[5] Further, an option to terminate upon notice conferred by the contract does not constitute the licensor's exclusive remedy in case of breach by the licensor.[6]

[§ 439] f. Repudiation or Abandonment by Licensee as Ground. The licensee may forfeit his rights under the license by an abandonment or renunciation of his contract,[7] and on his repudiation the patentee is released from further performance.[8] Nonuser may show sufficient abandonment to permit the license to be treated as forfeited,[9] and may entitle the licensor to a rescission of the license.[10] Assistance, by the licensee, to an adverse litigant to defeat the patent does not amount to repudiation or abandonment;[11] nor does nonperformance when the licensors prevent performance.[12] The failure of the licensee to respond to a notice by the licensor, that it has elected to consider the license as repudiated by the licensee and terminated, does not amount to an acquiescence in such termination.[13] The license need not be reconveyed on repudiation,[14] although it has been held that a licensee for use must tender return of the patented article as a condition precedent to asking for rescission of the license.[15]

[§ 440] g. Assignment of License. An unauthorized assignment of a license by the licensee is a nullity, and will not work a forfeiture,[16] unless it amounts to an abandonment.[17] A stipulation for termination in case of assignment is valid and enforceable.[18]

[§ 441] h. Death of Licensee. A mere personal license expires with the death of the licensee, and does not pass to his personal representatives,[19] although the contrary has been held.[20]

[§ 442] i. Dissolution of Partnership or Corporation. The dissolution of a partnership or corporation exercising a patent license extinguishes the license, in the absence of language importing transferability,[21] except as to a continuing partner.[22] The same result follows the absorption of the licensee corporation by another corporation.[23]

[§ 443] j. Termination of Business Association. A license to two or more individuals is not affected by a termination of their association in business.[24]

[§ 444] k. Partial Rescission. A licensee cannot repudiate the license in part and claim under it in part.[25] So where a contract provides for an exchange of license and contains mutual and interdependent covenants, a single license forming a small part of the subject matter of the contract cannot be treated by a party as rescinded or abrogated and the remainder of the contract held to be in force.[26] The surrender of a license by part of the licensees does not avoid the license as to the remainder of the licensees.[27]

[§ 445] l. Waiver. The right to rescind or otherwise terminate the agreement may be waived,[28] and such waiver constitutes a sufficient considera-

[a] Illustration.—The doctrine that, where a party to an executory contract puts it out of his power to perform, the other party may regard the contract as terminated and demand damages sustained, is inapplicable, where the licensor for manufacture of an article under a patent inexcusably breached the contract by a sale and assignment, so that he could not protect as to infringers and infringements as provided in the license agreement, where the licensee did not exercise its right to terminate the contract while executory, but used the license to contracted termination. Rosenthal Paper Co. v. National Folding Box, etc., Co., 226 N. Y. 313, 123 NE 766.

[b] Waiver by new contract.—The right to forfeit an exclusive selling license under a patent for failure to earn a minimum royalty may be annulled or waived by a subsequent contract between the parties. Barnett v. Q. & C. Co., 226 Fed. 935, 141 CCA 539.

tion for a promise to pay the royalties due.[29] But when the license has been forfeited, it cannot be revived by a tender of royalties due.[30]

[§ 446] m. Effect of Termination. When a license has been properly terminated,[31] the rights and liabilities of the licensee thereunder are likewise brought to an end,[32] and his further use of the patented articles may be enjoined.[33] He no longer has a right to use the licensor's name in connection with articles subsequently manufactured by him so as to lead the public to understand that they were made under the licensor's patent;[34] and he is no longer estopped to deny the validity of the patent,[35] although an agreement not to contest the patent may be enforced where the intent is clear that it shall continue after termination of the license.[36] He is no longer liable for royalties under the license;[37] he is liable only as an infringer.[38] He may, however, be liable for royalties under an implied promise.[39] A distinct, although subsidiary, agreement is not affected by the termination.[40]

[§ 447] 7. Royalties[41]—a. In General. The right of the owner of a patent to charge a royalty or license fee for the use of the invention being unquestioned,[42] the grant of the license is a sufficient consideration to support the promise to pay,[43] and the parties are bound by the terms of their contract[44] properly construed,[45] notwithstanding they may be harsh.[46] As in other cases[47] the terms of the license contract as to royalties may be modified by the subsequent agreement of the parties.[48] A memorandum incorporating in a license additional patents acquired by the licensor does not terminate his right to the license fees reserved in the original agreement.[49]

[§ 448] b. Implied Agreements. Although the terms of the contract ordinarily fix the right to royalty,[50] a promise to pay a reasonable compensation for the use of a patent may be implied,[51] but not unless one uses another's invention under circumstances that lead the owner to consent to such use in the belief that the user intended to pay therefor.[52] Mere acquiescence in the use of an improvement will not bind the licensee to pay the same royalty as he agreed to pay for the use of the patent.[53]

[§ 449] c. Effect of Assignment of Patent or Royalties. Royalties to accrue pass with an assignment of the patent unless separated by an express reservation,[54] and, in analogy to the right of the assignor to sue and recover for past infringements,[55] it would seem that he has like rights with respect to royalties accrued at the time of the assignment.[56] However, the right to recover accrued royalties may be assigned,[57] and where, with knowledge of the licensee, the licensor assigns a portion of the royalty to a third person for a valuable consideration, he cannot, by a secret settlement with the licensee, cut off the rights of such third person.[58] A stipulation upon the back of a note that it is to be paid by royalties earned from the use of an invention amounts to an equitable assignment of such royal-

[a] Consideration for modification.—Plaintiff granted to defendant an exclusive license under a patent, and defendant agreed to pay royalties after three years on not less than a stated number of the patented machines annually. The contract was subsequently modified by parol, but whether the provision requiring the payment of minimum royalties had been abrogated was in dispute. Plaintiff failed to protect defendant against infringers of the patent, and finally abandoned any attempt to do so, and, in consequence, defendant ceased to make the patented article, never paid the stipulated minimum royalty, but paid on the machines actually made, and no claim was made until eight years after the first of such payments was due. The failure of plaintiff to maintain the validity of its patent and protect defendant as its licensee was sufficient consideration for the modification of the contract claimed by defendant. ties to the payee.[59]

[§ 450] d. Effect of Assignment of License. When a license has been assigned, the assignee is bound by its terms,[60] and by acceptance of the assignment becomes bound to pay the license fee to the licensor.[61] A licensee who has assigned his license[62] remains liable for the royalties due.[63]

[§ 451] e. Duration of Period for Which Payment To Be Made. The terms of the contract control as to the time during which royalty payments are to be made.[64] As a license to use a patented invention may be granted prior to the issuance of the patent,[65] the licensor may be entitled to royalties for use of the invention before issuance of the patent.[66] As a general rule the liability to pay royalties terminates at the expiration of the patent,[67] although the parties may contract to the contrary.[68]

[§ 452] f. When Liability Accrues. If the licensee exercises the rights granted him under the license he is liable, during the continuation of the license, for the stipulated fee or royalty for the use of the patent,[69] and this whether the article is fully protected by patent or not,[70] or although, after the agreement, a patent was refused.[71] No royalties can be required on an agreement to grant a license under a patent if the patent is never granted.[72] Where no time for payment is stipulated in the contract, royalty attendant upon sales of patented articles becomes due as each article is sold,[73] and after a reasonable time, on demand, the licensee is bound to account.[74] Although a contract for a license fee based upon sales of the patented article provides for a minimum payment, the liability is contingent and creates no debt until the time stipulated for payment arrives.[75] Where a royalty is to be paid upon manufacture and sale of articles under the patent, the debt does not accrue until there is both a manufacture and sale.[76]

[§ 453] g. Measure and Amount of Royalty. Where the terms of the license agreement fix the amount of the royalties to be paid,[77] or provide the mode by which such amount is to be ascertained,[78] their proper construction is controlling as to such matters, for example, with regard to the sales which are to be included[79] or the uses which are to be paid for.[80]

Provisions for minimum sum. When the contract provides for the payment of royalty on each article sold, and binds the licensee to pay royalty on not less than a stated number of articles a year, he must pay royalty on at least such stipulated number without reference to the number of articles sold;[81] and likewise, where the contract provides for payment of a minimum specified sum for the privileges granted, the licensee is bound to at least that amount.[82] How-

App. Div. 161, 127 NYS 994.

[b] Reduction of agreed amount.—(1) Where a contract provides for an equal rate of royalty payable by licensees, a license to one for less royalty entitles the others to reduction (Newport News Shipbuilding, etc., Co. v. Isherwood, 5 F. (2d) 924; Guggenheim v. Kirchhofer, 66 Fed. 755, 14 CCA 72; Florence Sewing Mach. Co. v. Grover, etc., Sewing Mach. Co., 110 Mass. 70, 14 AmR 579 [aff 18 Wall. (U. S.) 553, 21 NE 914]), (2) although the contract allowing less royalties is never acted on (Guggenheim v. Kirchhofer, supra). (3) A decree pro confesso is not within the terms and conditions of a license providing for a reduction of the amount of royalties on a decision by the United States circuit court holding the patent valid. Kerosene Lamp Heater Co. v. Monitor Oil Stove Co., 41 Oh. St. 287. (4) A provision that, in case the patent should be held not infringed by a certain manufacture by "any court of competent jurisdiction," the royalty should be reduced and limited in all to a certain sum, must be construed as meaning a decision which should finally settle the question of such infringement and a decision of noninfringement by a trial court, which was reversed on appeal, did not have the effect of reducing the royalty. Critcher v. Linker, 169 Fed. 653. (5) Failure to perform conditions precedent to reduction prevents any valid agreement to reduce royalties. Bowers v. Lake Superior Contracting, etc., Co., 149 Fed. 983, 79 CCA 493.

[c] Provision for increase.—(1) A provision that the royalty "shall be forty-five per cent in lieu of forty per cent" in cases of sales abroad by the licensee will be construed as prospective, causing the higher rate to apply only as to transactions after the commencement of sales abroad. National Sewing-Mach. Co. v. Willcox, etc., Sewing Mach. Co., 74 Fed. 557, 20 CCA 654. (2) Final adjudication of validity is a condition precedent for increase of the amount where it is agreed that the amount shall be increased if the patent is found valid. Comptograph Co. v. Burroughs Adding Mach. Co., 179 Iowa 83, 159 NW 465. (3) Condition not waived by acceptance of benefit of nisi prius decree and consenting to reversal of that decree. Comptograph Co. v. Burroughs Adding Mach. Co., supra.

[d] Penalty requiring larger sum to be paid if lesser sum is not paid promptly is unenforceable, and payment of the lesser sum is all that can be required. Goodyear Shoe Mach. Co. v. Selz, etc., Co., 157 Ill. 186, 41 NE 625.

[e] Parol agreement, prior to the execution of a written contract fixing a specified rate of royalties, cannot be shown by the licensee to vary the terms of the written agreement. Standard Fireproofing Co. v. St. Louis Expanded Metal Fireproofing Co., 177 Mo. 559, 76 SW 1008.

[f] Provision for termination on failure to pay the royalties stipulated does not waive payment according to the contract during its continuance. Cummings v. Standard Harrow Co., 55 Misc. 601, 105 NYS 646 [aff 124 App. Div. 915 mem, 108 NYS 1128 mem (aff 195 N. Y. 513 mem, 88 NE 1117 mem)].

[g] Agreement to pay lump sum construed and held not to require the payment of a yearly lump sum where the contract was terminated by mutual consent before the end of a year. In re Dr. Voorhees Awning Hood Co., 187 Fed. 611 [rev on other grounds 188 Fed. 425, 110 CCA 215].

[a] A practical construction by the parties may control as to: (1) "Gross sales." Horvath v. McCord Radiator, etc., Co., 27 F. (2d) 148. (2) Payment of royalty on sale price of entire article, and not a part of the article. Keith v. Electrical Engineering Co., 136 Cal. 178, 68 P 598.

79. See cases infra this note.

[a] Particular provisions construed.—(1) Where the agreement is to pay royalties for sales made within a particular state, liability attaches in the case of sales made outside of the state for use within the state. Illinois Terra Cotta Lumber Co. v. Owen, 167 Ill. 360, 47 NE 722 [rev 64 Ill. A. 632]. (2) Where the agreement is to pay a royalty upon goods sold and delivered while the contract is in force, a royalty does not accrue upon goods sold during a period of suspension of the contract, although delivered after it had again become operative. Fries v. Merck, 167 N. Y. 445, 60 NE 777. (3) Provision for payment on machines "sold and delivered" includes machines delivered but not paid for, although taken back by licensee. Confectioners' Mach., etc., Co. v. Panoualias, 134 Fed. 393, 67 CCA 391. (4) A provision for the payment of royalties on sales after expiration of the license does not apply when the license is breached by the fault of the licensor. National Marking Mach. Co. v. Triumph Mfg. Co., 13 F. (2d) 6. (5) A contract for the manufacture of patented silos entitled plaintiff to five per cent of the proceeds of the sale of such patented silos, and not of other silos which defendant might sell. National Fire Proofing Co. v. Imperishable Silo Co., 63 Ind. A. 183, 112 NE 403. (6) A license, requiring payment of royalties for the manufacture and sale of circular tiling under a patent, was held to include sales of portions of the tiling alone. Alexander v. American Encaustic Tiling Co., 207 N. Y. 276, 100 NE 809.

[b] Agreement by sublicensee.—On an accounting under a license contract, which authorized the licensee to grant sublicenses, accounting to the licensors for a stated royalty on each patented article sold by the sublicensee, where a sublicensee paid an agreed sum for the license privilege, which entitled him to sell a stated number of the articles without further payment, the licensors are entitled to the royalty on such number, without regard to the number actually sold. Reizenstein v. Koopman, 178 Fed. 546, 101 CCA 462 [aff 176 Fed. 922].

[c] Furnishing for use by United States.—A licensee to make and use a patented invention is not excused from payment of royalties for such use merely because he furnishes the article to the United States. Newport News Shipbuilding, etc., Co. v. Isherwood, 5 F. (2d) 924 [rev on other grounds 289 Fed. 282].

80. [a] For example (1) under a license requiring the licensee to pay a royalty upon every car built or caused to be built by it embodying the patented devices, it must pay a royalty upon cars which it has built for it by a builder which is also a licensee under the patent. Pressed Steel Car Co. v. Union Pac. R. Co., 270 Fed. 518 [rev 254 Fed. 316]. (2) Contract for payment of certain royalty on drilling jars did not require payment of broken jars. Dick's App., 8 Pa. Okl.—Hyatt v. Vinita Brass Works, 89 Okl. 171, 214 P 706.

Pa.—Bayliss v. Hough, 41 Pa. Super. 454.

[a] Rule applied.—In a contract for the assignment of patents in which the assignee agreed to pay a royalty on each of the articles it constructed, a provision that, beginning on a specified date, the assignee "shall guarantee that the royalty upon elevators erected and constructed by it . . . shall amount to not less than three thousand dollars," did not obligate the assignee to construct articles each year, the royalty on which should amount to three thousand dollars, but was no more than an agreement to pay that amount if the royalties on the articles constructed amounted to less. Neenan v. Otis El. Co., 180 Fed. 997 [aff 194 Fed. 414, 114 CCA 376].

[b] Binding on assignor of license.—(1) A contract for the sale of patented gas irons and the payment of royalties to plaintiff was held to bind defendant's assignors to pay plaintiff guaranteed royalties amounting to at least one hundred and fifty dollars a month, whether irons sufficient to make royalties average that amount were sold or not. Capell v. Capell Sales Co., 165 Cal. 334, 132 P 260. (2) Where the contract, although fixing the royalty at a certain sum for each article sold, provides for the payment of a minimum sum, the minimum sum only can be claimed in the absence of evidence of the number of articles sold. Volk v. Bergman, 14 Misc. 443, 35 NYS 1025.

82. American Delinting Co. v. Pomeraning, 274 Fed. 212; Simonds Rolling Mach. Co. v. Pope Mfg. Co., 180 Mass. 393, 62 NE 467; Hackett v. Hackett Hatch Door Mfg. Co., 52 N. Y. Super. 263 [aff 108 N. Y. 665 mem, 15 NE 445 mem]; Beecher v. Stein, 139 Pa. 570, 21 A 79.

[a] Thus an agreement to pay a certain sum on a fixed date during the term of the patent and all renewals or extensions requires the licensee to pay that sum each year during the life of the patent, even though he does not use the article. Simonds Rolling Mach. Co. v. Pope Mfg. Co., 180 Mass. 393, 62 NE 467.

[b] Particular agreements construed.—(1) A contract for leasing solder-saving machines, providing for the payment as rental of one third the saving of the machines each month, a provision immediately following, "but the minimum amount of rent or ever, the licensee is not bound in either instance to pay the minimum amount where it is fixed merely as an alternative to avoid a forfeiture or termination of the license,[83] or where the contract is illegal.[84]

Reasonable amount. Where a patent is made use of under an implied license[85] or implied agreement for the payment of royalties,[86] the owner is entitled to recover a reasonable compensation therefor,[87] which may be determined by the testimony of experts,[88] and other evidence as to the value of the invention.[89]

Deductions and offsets. The licensee may not deduct, from the amount of royalties due, the amount expended in defending a suit to cancel his license;[90] nor may he, when sued for infringement of a patent other than the one he is licensed to use, deduct from the royalties the sum expended in such litigation,[91] or the amount recovered against him.[92]

Interest. On failure to pay royalties due under the contract the licensee may be charged with interest thereon.[93]

[§ 454] h. Use of Other Processes or Patented Articles as Imposing Liability. Patents not possessed by plaintiff and in which he had no right do not, in the absence of express agreement, afford a ground for the recovery of royalty.[94] The licensee is not liable for royalties on articles manufactured by him which are not covered by the patent,[95] or on articles made by a process other than that of the patentee.[96] But he is liable where he uses an article equivalent to that patented, al-royalty paid in any calendar year, after the year in which the machines are installed, shall be three hundred dollars for each machine," was unambiguous, reasonable, and valid, it being shown that, if a machine was continuously used, the royalty would much exceed such sum. Fellows v. National Can Co., 257 Fed. 970, 169 CCA 120 [certiorari den 250 U. S. 662 mem, 40 SCt 11 mem, 63 L. ed. 1195 mem] (minimum amount on returned machines due only for portion of year machine was used). (2) A provision that the royalty shall not be less than a certain sum "in any one year in which the licensee operates under the license" does not mean merely that the royalty shall not be less than such sum in any one year. Elliott v. Barrett Co., 25 F. (2d) 125, 126 [aff 25 F. (2d) 126].

[c] Alternative provisions.—Where a contract for the manufacture of a minimum number of oil burners and payment of royalty on such minimum number also provides that plaintiff has the option, in the event of failure to manufacture and pay for such minimum number as provided in the contract, to buy the machinery of the company together with its rights under the contract, plaintiff may elect to exercise his option or to insist on the manufacture and payment of royalty on the minimum number of burners, and, in the event of the failure to pay therefor, may maintain an action to recover the amount due, and the other party to the contract has no right to demand of him the exercise of his option and to declare a forfeiture of contract upon failure to exercise such option. Ebert v. Loewenstein, 42 App. Div. 109, 58 NYS 889 [aff 167 N. Y. 577 mem, 60 NE 1110 mem]. (2) A provision of an agreement that it is mutually agreed that, in order to keep this agreement in force, the licensee or its assigns shall pay a stated minimum yearly royalty, gives to the licensee an optional right to pay those minimum royalties as a condition of avoiding forfeiture by the licensor, and does not impose on the licensee the duty to pay them for the full life of the patent. Standard Appliance Co. v. Standard Equipment Co., 296 Fed. 456. (3) A licensee of an exclusive right to use a patented spring in the manufacture of automobiles, with the option to release the exclusive right and pay less, is estopped to assert oral surrender of the right, in view of letters indicating retention of the right. [a] Rule applied.—(1) The making of a machine that will perform the same functions as the machine covered by the patent is not the exercise of any right under the license, unless there is an adaptation of the principle covered by the patent. Bucher, etc., Plow Co. v. International Harvester Co., 10 F. (2d) 24. (2) The licensee of a patented device consisting of two elements is not liable for royalties on a device producing the same result by a single element. Rathbun v. Wolverine Metal Specialties Co., 240 Mich. 603, 216 NW 454. (3) Under a contract entitling plaintiff to royalty "upon all other manufactures" of defendant "embodying" any or all inventions by plaintiff, he was not entitled to royalty on a particular article which did not contain within, or as a part of, its physical structure any invention of plaintiff, although several patented machines and process invented by plaintiff were used in its "manufacture," "embody" being used in its primary and ordinary sense, and "manufactures" as so used relating to patent meaning an article or manufacture, a concrete marketable product. Rockwell v. New Departure Mfg. Co., 102 Conn. 255, 128 A 302.

though in different form,[97] or uses a process, although making slight changes in the apparatus.[98] And a licensee under a patent, who has for several years manufactured, stamped, advertised, and sold an article as made under such patent, and paid royalties thereon to the licensor, is estopped thereafter in an action for further royalties to deny that such article was covered by the patent.[99]

[§ 455] i. Duty of Licensee To Make Use of License. A licensee is not bound to use the patent of the licensor, but only to abide by the terms of the license in case he does use it.[1]

[§ 456] j. Defenses to Liability for Royalty—(1) In General. A royalty contract is, so far as they may be applicable, subject to the same excuses for nonperformance as exist in the case of contracts generally.[2] The licensee cannot avoid liability on the ground that no formal execution or delivery of the license was made.[3]

[§ 457] (2) Failure of Consideration.[4] While it would seem that, where the licensee receives the patent which he has bargained for, there cannot be an entire failure of consideration,[5] it has been held in some jurisdictions that the entire worthlessness of the patent may constitute a defense to a claim for the purchase price of the license,[6] and that a right alleged to be exclusive may be shown by the licensee not to be in fact such.[7] It is sufficient to sustain a plea of want of consideration to show that no patent had ever issued for the article licensed to be made and sold,[8] or that it does not confer the right contemplated by the parties.[9] Where the fact that patents may be held invalid is a recognized factor leading to the making of the contract, it cannot be held that there is a complete failure of consideration upon a subsequent adjudication of their invalidity.[10]

[§ 458] (3) Fraud or Misrepresentation. Fraudulent representations inducing the acceptance of the license may constitute a defense to liability for royalties thereunder,[11] although the licensee cannot complain of false representations which have caused him no injury.[12] A licensee from one having no right to convey a license must offer to return what he has purchased before he can avail himself of a defense of fraud when sued for the purchase price of his license.[13]

[§ 459] (4) Failure of Licensor To Perform Dependent Covenants.[14] In order that the licensor may recover he must have fulfilled any conditions precedent imposed upon him by the license agreement,[15] but his failure to perform an independent covenant, while it may impose a liability upon him to respond in damages, will not prevent him from enforcing his claim for royalties.[16] Where the agreement is to pay license fees in case the patented device fulfills certain guaranteed requirements, the fulfillment of such requirements, unless waived, is a condition to liability upon the part of the licensee.[17]

[§ 460] (5) Invalidity of Patent—(a) In General. A licensee, where the patent which is the subject matter of the license is apparently valid and in force, cannot, when sued for royalties payable under the agreement, set up the supposed invalidity of the patent and the consequent failure of consideration of the agreement,[18] especially where he has, by his contract, acknowledged its validity and agreed not to contest it;[19] and in order to permit the licensee to defend by attacking the validity of the patent something corresponding to an eviction from the enjoyment of the rights conferred by the license must be shown.[20] By some authorities, it has been held, however, that when, in addition to the invalidity of the patent by reason of a prior outstanding patent for the same invention, it is shown that the owner of the prior patent is asserting his exclusive rights thereunder by supplying the market with the patented article, forbidding all interference upon the part of others, etc., and the licensee under the invalid patent is deprived of the enjoyment of the monopoly for which he contracted and in consideration of which he agreed to pay the royalty, he may defend on the ground of the actual failure of the [b] A decree for infringement is an eviction of the licensee under the patent declared to be infringing. Macon Knitting Co. v. Leicester Mills Co., 65 N. J. Eq. 138, 55 A 401.

[c] Surrender and reissue not an eviction so as to release licensee from liability for royalties due prior to surrender and reissue. Barber Asphalt Pav. Co. v. Headley Good Roads Co., 284 Fed. 177 [aff 292 Fed. 119] (eviction has no effect on liability for royalties accruing prior thereto).

[d] Licensee under nonexclusive license is not evicted when the licensor gives to others the same rights, there being no stipulation in the license that he would not do so. McKay v. Smith, 39 Fed. 556 [app dism 161 U. S. 355, 16 SCt 490, 40 L. ed. 731].

consideration.[21]

[§ 461] (b) Effect of Adjudication of Invalidity. The licensee, if evicted from the use of the patent by a judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction declaring the patent invalid, may, after giving notice to the licensor, defend against the payment of royalties subsequently accruing,[22] although remaining liable for royalties previously earned.[23] Where the licensee has not been prevented from using the patented invention, the mere adjudication of the invalidity of the patent does not relieve him from liability for payment of royalties so long as he continues the use thereof.[24] Where, by the agreement of the parties, the payment of royalties is to cease in case the patent is declared invalid or void by a court of competent jurisdiction, the licensee remains liable for royalties until it has been so declared void.[25]

[§ 462] (c) Effect of Renunciation of License. Where the patent is in fact invalid, the licensee may renounce and abandon the license and, after having given notice thereof to the licensor, defend against an action to recover royalties subsequently accruing,[26] but an unequivocal notice is necessary.[27]

[§ 463] (6) Competition by Other Licensees or Infringers. Where the licensor, in addition to a grant of the license, has covenanted to protect the exclusive rights conferred, a failure upon his part to perform such covenant precludes a recovery of royalties,[28] but, in the absence of an agreement to protect the licensee from competition by infringers, such competition affords no defense to such an action;[29] nor does infringement by the patentee of an exclusive right granted to the licensee.[30] The fact that the licensor has granted other licenses or failed to prevent competition with the licensee does not relieve the licensee from his liability for royalties where no monopoly is given him by the license.[31] In an action for accounting for royalties the licensee may not set up a breach of contract to protect him from infringers when the breach was due to his own fault.[32]

[§ 464] (7) Nonuser. A use of any part of the invention renders the licensee liable for the stipulated royalty unless his liability is expressly limited.[33] Where a license grants an exclusive right to use an invention, the failure of the licensee to make use of it is no defense to an action to recover the agreed compensation.[34] A mere option to make use of a patented machine or process upon the payment of a specified royalty imposes no liability for royalty except as the patent is made use of under the option.[35]

[§ 465] (8) Termination of License. When a license has been properly terminated,[36] the licensee is no longer liable for royalties,[37] although he must pay those royalties which accrued before the license was terminated;[38] and a licensee who continues to operate under a license pending an appeal from a judgment canceling the contract is liable for royalties accruing during the pendency of the appeal.[39] When the licensee has renounced his license, the licensor may sue him for breach of contract or infringement,[40] and, if the license is terminable only by mutual consent,[41] the licensor may sue, after receiving notice of renunciation, for royalties for the continued use of his invention.[42]

[§ 466] (9) Estoppel To Assert Defense. One who has continued to act in the manner authorized by a license which he has entered into cannot, without notice to the licensor that he has repudiated or terminated the license, assert in defense of a claim for royalties that he was not acting thereunder;[43] nor can he assert that the patent was valueless because lacking in novelty.[44]

[§ 467] k. Lien for Royalties. An agreement to pay royalties is a personal contract, and creates no lien on the manufactured articles.[45]

[§ 468] 8. Enforcement of Licenses—a. In General. The rights and liabilities of the parties arise from the license contract and are to be determined from its terms and conditions.[46]

Violation by licensor or patentee. Where the licensee has exclusive right within certain territory the patentee cannot invade that right and the licensee may maintain suit against him for infringement,[47] or breach of contract;[48] and the failure of the licensor to protect his licensee from infringers after covenanting to do so will entitle the licensee to cancellation of the contract,[49] or damages for the breach,[50] which may be recovered by separate suit or by counterclaim in an action for royalties.[51]

Violation by licensee. Where a licensee violates his express covenants or repudiates the license, the licensor may sue either for breach of the agreement,[52] for infringement,[53] for specific performance,[54] or for forfeiture of the license.[55]

Waiver or excuse of breach. A breach of a covenant or condition in a license may be waived[56] or excused;[57] but the waiver of a past breach does not preclude the party from insisting upon future compliance with the license,[58] provided protection be given against damage resulting from reliance upon the waiver.[59]

[§ 469] b. Enjoining Use of Invention—(1) By Licensee. A provisional injunction will be granted against a licensee to restrain his use of a patented article in violation of restrictions contained in the license,[60] or its use after expiration of the license,[61] and the licensee may be enjoined from using the patent without paying the license fee;[62] but no injunction will be granted where there is no actual or threatened violation,[63] or were the licensor was guilty of fraud,[64] or where it appears that the licensee violated the restrictions under a misapprehension of his rights, and had discontinued the violation.[65] An assignee cannot enjoin a licensee given a valid license prior to the assignment.[66] The exercise of a license to build a certain number of patented machines will not be restrained until such number of machines has been completed.[67]

[§ 470] (2) By Licensor. A licensee having an exclusive license may enjoin interference with his rights by the licensor,[68] and, the licensor having been enjoined, a violation of the injunction will render him guilty of contempt.[69] No injunction will be granted where he has an adequate legal remedy,[70] or where the licensor has done nothing against his exclusive rights.[71] It has been held that an exclusive licensee cannot enjoin the use of the invention by some third person.[72] A bill by a licensee to enjoin the licensor from manufacturing the goods contrary to his agreement cannot be maintained where it appears that the licensee himself has ceased to manufacture any goods under the license.[73]

[§ 471] c. Recovery of Royalties.[74] Royalties are ordinarily collected by an action at law,[75] and equity will not grant relief where the licensor's rem-

"Where it is solely a question of unpaid compensation, courts of law have exclusive jurisdiction, and can give an adequate remedy." Hazeltine Research Corp. v. Freed-Eisemann Radio Corp., 3 F. (2d) 172, 178 [rev on other grounds 10 F. (2d) 148].

edy at law is adequate.[76] Where the remedy at law is inadequate, however, the licensor may maintain a bill in equity for an accounting,[77] unless he has been guilty of misconduct;[78] and an action for an accounting may be joined with a demand for equitable relief by forfeiture of the license,[79] or a demand for injunction to prevent further use in violation of the agreement,[80] and, having obtained jurisdiction, equity will give complete and adequate relief.[81] A licensee cannot enjoin the licensor from bringing action for the recovery of royalties when he can adequately present his defense in an action at law.[82]

Laches. The licensor may lose his right to recover royalties by delay in bringing suit,[83] but mere delay is not enough to constitute laches.[84]

Jurisdiction. State courts have jurisdiction of an action to recover royalties under an agreement where there is no question as to the validity of the patent;[85] but when the validity is in dispute the federal courts alone have jurisdiction.[86]

[§ 472] d. Recovery of Royalties Erroneously Paid. A licensee who has terminated his agreement because of misrepresentations by which he was induced to accept the license[87] may recover back the royalties he has paid;[88] but no recovery can be had when the parties had equal opportunities of ascertaining the true situation,[89] or where the alleged false representations are not shown to have been relied or acted upon.[90]

[§ 473] e. Parties. The general rules relating to parties in civil actions[91] apply to actions growing out of licenses or contracts relating to, or dealing with, patents and patent rights.[92] One of several coöwners may sue alone to recover royalties and profits due for the use of the patent,[93] and a partner of the licensor may sue in equity when he was not a party to the contract.[94] A licensor who has parted with his right to royalties, but retained the right to collect them, is the proper party to sue for the royalties due.[95] All parties whose rights will be affected must be joined;[96] but persons having no interest in the outcome of the litigation are properly omitted;[97] and so, when some of several licensees have been released by a surrender of the license they need not be made parties to a suit on the license against the remaining licensees.[98] Failure to join proper parties must be objected to in

[a] Rule applied.—An action for an accounting and for specific performance cannot be maintained by one to whom royalties are due for the manufacture and sale of a patented device, merely because plaintiff does not know the amount thereof and defendant has failed to render statements as agreed; and a complaint alleging plaintiff's ignorance of the amount due and demanding judgment for no definite sum is demurrable. Barnes v. American Brake-Beam Co., 238 Ill. 582, 87 NE 291. (2) Plaintiff, suing for an accounting for royalties after defendants' breach of his employment contract, was held entitled to an accounting as of the date of the judgment to be rendered in a superior court. time.[99]

[§ 474] f. Pleading—(1) Declaration, Petition, Complaint, or Bill. The rules relating to pleadings in civil actions generally,[1] and particularly in actions on contracts,[2] ordinarily apply in an action on a license or contract relating to a patent or patent rights.[3] The declaration, petition, or complaint must state a sufficient cause of action,[4] or, if equitable relief is sought, the bill must state an equity;[5] and it must show what relief is desired.[6] Under the rules of pleading relating to surplusage,[7] unnecessary averments may be stricken out of the pleadings;[8] but, if not stricken, those which relieve the other party from setting up the same matter affirmatively must be proved by the pleader.[9] In accordance with the general rules relating to the amendment of pleadings,[10] a declaration may be amended to state the injury more particularly,[11] or even to show the first time a new cause of action.[12]

[§ 475] (2) Plea or Answer. The rules relating to pleas or answers in civil actions generally[13] govern pleas or answers in actions involving rights under patent licenses or contracts.[14]

[§ 476] (3) Variance. The rules relating to variance between pleadings and proof in civil actions generally[15] apply in actions on licenses or contracts dealing with patents and patent rights.[16] Thus, in an action to recover royalties accruing down to the time of the commencement of the action, evidence of royalties earned between the commencement of the action and trial thereof is not within the issues.[17] Where a declaration in substance alleges modification of a written contract, evidence of a supplemental oral agreement cannot be excluded as not pleaded;[18] and proof of such an agreement, even though not mentioned in the pleadings, is not a fatal variance when the other party to the action is not injured or misled.[19] Evidence of the situation of the parties at the time of making the license agreement may be admitted, although not pleaded, in the discretion of the court.[20]

[§ 477] g. Evidence—(1) Burden of Proof and Presumptions. The usual rules as to the burden of proof[21] and presumptions[22] in civil actions generally are applicable in actions on licenses or contracts dealing with patents or patent rights.[23] Thus, in an action for royalties, the burden is upon the patentee to show that the articles on which he claims royalties were covered by the patent,[24] while the licensee has the burden of proving lack of title in the licensor,[25] uselessness of the patented article,[26] or fraud;[27] and in an action for infringement, the burden is on plaintiff to show that a license produced by defendant was delivered in escrow upon a condition which had not been performed.[28]

[§ 478] (2) Admissibility. The general rules as to the admissibility of evidence in civil actions[29] apply in actions on licenses or contracts dealing with patents and patent rights.[30]

[§ 479] (3) Weight and Sufficiency. The rules

Darrasse v. Ferment Co., 182 App. Div. 591, 169 NYS 963. (2) An answer alleging false representations as to the novelty, patentability, and satisfactoriness of an invention, and that it was in great demand, and that a designated person known to defendant was then organizing a corporation to purchase manufacturing rights, sufficiently sets up fraud and is good as an answer in an action to recover on a note given for a right in the patent. Prescott v. Brown, 30 Okl. 428, 120 P 991.

to use only the patented article is the amount of royalties the licensor would have realized had the contract been complied with.[46]

[§ 483] D. Agency Contracts. A contract giving an exclusive right to sell a patented article in a specified territory is ordinarily a license,[47] but such a contract, making no mention of patents, patent licenses, royalties, or anything else to indicate that it is a license creates merely an exclusive agency.[48] Where the duration of such a contract depends on the value of sales made, the minimum which controls is the amount of sales and not the amount paid to the principal.[49] A contract of agency to sell machines is breached by refusal to supply machines for sale.[50] The mere recital that the articles are patented has been held not to establish the intent that the term of the patent should be the term of the agreement.[51]

XIV. REGULATION OF DEALINGS IN PATENT RIGHTS AND PATENTED ARTICLES

[By MANUEL PRENNER]

[§ 484] A. By Congress—1. Marking Patented Articles. It is the duty of a patentee or of his assigns and legal representatives, and of all persons making or vending any patented article for or under them, to give sufficient notice to the public that the same is patented, either by fixing thereon the word "patented," together with the day and year the patent was granted; or when, from the character of the article, the word "patented" cannot be so affixed, by fixing to it or to the package wherein one or more of them is inclosed a label containing the like notice.[52] The notice must include the date on which the patent was granted,[53] stating the day, as well as the month and year.[54] Where possible, the article itself, rather than the package, must be marked;[55] but it has been held that, where the article is small, something must be left to the judgment of the patentee as to whether to put such mark upon each article or to affix a label to the packages in which the articles are shipped and sold.[56]

Patent for process. The statute requiring marking has been held not to apply to a patent for a process.[57]

Penalty for failure to mark. The penalty prescribed for failure to comply with this rule is that in a suit for infringement no damages shall be recovered by the party failing so to mark the articles, except on proof that the infringer was duly notified of his infringement and continued, after such notice, to make, use, or vend the patented article.[58] The statute has more recently been held to apply to all patentees, including holders of patents under which the patented article has not been made or vended,[59] although earlier cases held that the statute does

Condit Electrical Mfg. Co., 159 Fed. 154 [aff 167 Fed. 546, 93 CCA 224]), (3) and includes profits (Parker Rust Proof Co. v. Ford Motor Co., 23 F. (2d) 502; MacBeth Evans Glass Co. v. L. E. not embrace a case where a patent since its issue has lain absolutely dormant, the patented article not being made or sold.[60-62] The notice of infringement required by the statute is necessary only in a case where the mark is not so attached, an infringer being innocent in the absence of such mark or notice.[63] But when an article contains such mark, an infringer is liable, although he is in fact ignorant of the existence of letters patent.[64] The statute requires some affirmative act of notification on the part of the patentee, the fact that defendant had actual knowledge of the patent and his infringement from some independent source being insufficient.[65] Notice of the existence of a patent is not notice of infringement as required by the statute.[66] Recovery has been limited to damages and profits arising on infringement after notice has been given,[67] and, where notice prior to the filing of the bill of complaint is not shown, damages are recoverable only for infringement after the filing which affords notice.[68] Likewise, where a court instead of granting an injunction ordered an account to be kept of the infringing articles, it was held that profits at least since the order should be given.[69] Failure to mark the patented article or to give notice has been held not to deprive the patentee of the right to an accounting for profits made by the infringer;[70] nor does such failure deprive complainant of the right to an injunction to prevent infringement.[71] Such failure has been held not to prevent recovery of nominal damages for infringement.[72]

[§ 485] 2. Marking Unpatented Articles. Anyone who, having no patent therefor, marks an article with the name, or imitation of the name, of any person who has a patent, without the latter's consent, or who marks upon an article an imitation or counterfeit of the mark or device of a patentee, or who marks upon an unpatented article the word "patent" or any word importing that the article is patented, for the purpose of deceiving the public, is liable, for every such offense, to a penalty of not less than one hundred dollars with costs; one half to go to the party suing, the other half to the United States, to be recovered by suit in any district court of the United States within whose jurisdiction the

[a] Reason for rule.—"To permit a patentee to disregard the specific duty imposed upon him by the statute of properly marking the patented articles and to continue for years in the violation of his duty and then to award him profits and damages for a period of six years preceding suit because one, who perchance may have been ignorant of his infringement, continues to infringe even in a single instance after the notice, would be, in our judgment, a complete perversion both of the letter and the spirit of the statute. It would enable a patentee, who has utterly disregarded his statutory duty, to recover the most highly punitive damages. The very purpose of the statute is to bar a patentee from recovering damages for acts done during the period when the patentee himself is violating his obligation toward the public." American Caramel Co. v. White, 234 Fed. 328, 333, 148 CCA 230.

New York Air Brake Co., 111 Fed. 741 (question raised).

"To permit an accounting . . . after notice given by the filing of the bill, if the complainant shall establish its right thereto, does not contravene the statute, since, notwithstanding such notice, the complainant can recover no damages unless it affirmatively shows infringement after notice." Co. v. Universal Hardware Works, 207 Fed. 97. See Jennings v. Rogers Silver Plate Co., 96 Fed. 340 (holding that the failure of a patentee to send, as promised, a copy of a patent to one whom he has informed thereof and whom he has informed that he is infringing, does not prevent him from being entitled to an accounting of profits made by the infringer).

"An infringer . . . may be making profits without the patentee knowing of it, because he is not otherwise damaged. The fact that an infringer is an innocent infringer without notice is a reason for relieving him from the payment of damages when he has made no profits. It is no reason for permitting him to retain profits which belong to another. The fact that he is innocent does not give him title to the property of another. Damages may be well denied, but profits allowed." Churchward International Steel Co. v. Bethlehem Steel Co., supra.

"The penalty imposed by the statute, for a failure to mark patented articles, is only the taking away of the right to recover damages in the suit. It does not affect the right to an injunction, either perpetual or provisional, as a remedy." Goodyear v. Allyn, supra.

[a] In Canada, while the only consequence to plaintiff of a breach of Patent Act § 55 (Rev. St. [1906] c 69), requiring marking, is the penalty imposed by § 69, the failure to mark does not affect the right to an injunction against infringement. Overend v. Stewart, etc., Co., 19 Ont. L. 642, 14 OntWR 961.

72. B. B. Hill Mfg. Co. v. Stewart, 116 Fed. 927; McComb v. Brodie, 15 F. Cas. No. 8,708, 5 Fish. Pat. Cas. 384, 1 Woods 153.

[a] For example, only nominal damages will be allowed where it ap-offense was committed.[73] To create the offense of marking an unpatented article as patented, the intent to deceive the public, and consequently knowledge of the falseness of the claim, are necessary;[74] hence, the article marked must appear to be one which might lawfully be patented, in order that there may exist a possibility of deceiving the public.[75] Marking an article with intent to deceive is an offense, even though the article is not sold, while selling an article innocently marked is not.[76] The intention to secure a patent subsequently does not excuse the offense, if it was intended to deceive the public;[77] it is otherwise if the article is not offered for sale until the patent is granted.[78] After application for a patent the article may be stamped "patent applied for,"[79] and the word "patented" may be affixed when the patent has been allowed but not issued.[80] After the patent has expired, marking the word "patented," with the date of the patent, upon a previously patented article, is not an offense under the statute.[81]

Corporations have been held to be within the statute and liable for offenses committed under it.[82]

Amount of penalty. The penalty of "not less than one hundred dollars" has been held to be one of not more than one hundred dollars.[83] The penalty is not recoverable for each article marked, but the marking of a number of articles as one continuous act constitutes but one offense.[84]

Action for penalty.[85] Anyone, whether or not interested in the patent or injured by the infringement, may bring the action for the penalty.[86] Suit must be brought in the name of the informer, and not of the United States,[87] and must be brought in the district where the offense was committed.[88] The burden is upon plaintiff to show that the article marked "patented" is not protected by a patent,[89] as well as that it was so marked with the purpose of deceiving the public.[90] The jury must be reasonably satisfied that an unpatented article was marked "patented;" but proof beyond a reasonable doubt is not required.[91]

Injunction against marking. It has been held that marking articles as patented under a patent which is in fact owned by another will be enjoined by the court without examining the question of the validity of the patent involved.[92]

[§ 486] B. By States—1. With Respect to Patented Articles. The owner of a patent himself cannot make and sell his patented articles in violation pears that for a time plaintiffs made and sold the patented article without marking it "patented." B. B. Hill Mfg. Co. v. Stewart, 116 Fed. 927.

"Where the article marked is obviously very remote from the patent referred to in justification of the marking, this difference alone may be sufficient to show an intention to deceive; but where the difference is slight, and the question of the breadth of the invention or of the claims is so close as to permit of an honest difference of opinion, then it may become necessary for the plaintiff to adduce testimony additional to the fact that the article is unpatented, in order to show guilty knowledge as distinguished from erroneous opinion." [a] Reason for rule.—"Can it be said that the public is deceived by the notice, inscribed upon or affixed to a manufactured article, that it has been patented, and that the patent has expired? The 'public' is presumed to know . . . that a patent issued on the 9th day of October, 1855, had expired on the 1st day of November, 1876." Wilson v. Singer Mfg. Co., 30 F. Cas. [a] Reason for rule.—"It would be difficult to reconcile such an implication [of authority to inflict a greater penalty than one hundred dollars] with the constitutional prohibition to impose excessive fines. . . . I know of no ground upon which the Court can assume to itself this power [to fix the amount of the penalty]; and there seems to be equal difficulty in maintaining that the jury are to exercise it. . . . The Act does not indicate that there are to be degrees of the offence, and it is not perceived that it admits of great aggravation." Stimpson v. Pond, 23 F. Cas. No. 13,455, 2 Curt. 502, 504. [a] Reason for rule.—"A fraudulent design maintained throughout the continuous marking of a number of articles cannot be divided into as many distinct fraudulent purposes as there are distinct overt acts of marking. Though the marking of each article makes a distinct instrument for the publication of a false statement, this cannot be a proper ground for multiplying penalties. The statute does not measure the penalty by the extent of publication, but affixes the penalty regardless of the fact of publication." London v. Everett H. of the laws of the state prescribed for the general welfare.[93] The right conferred by statute to make, use, and vend his invention throughout the United States and the territories thereof is not granted or secured without reference to the general powers which the several states of the Union unquestionably possess over their purely domestic affairs, whether of internal commerce or police.[94] The manufacture and sale of patented articles is subject to state legislation enacted in pursuance of the police power inherent in the state,[95] and to the taxing power of the states,[96] and a license fee can be required for selling in the state patented articles,[97] if there is no discrimination in such taxation as between the patented article and the sale of other similar articles in the state.[98]

[a] Rights within prescribed territory.—A contract by which the owner of a patent right conveys to another the exclusive right to sell the patented article within certain prescribed territory for a term of years is a sale of such an interest in a patent right as brings the transaction within statutes relating to the registration and sale of patent rights. New v. Walker, 108 Ind. 365, 9 NE 386, 58 AmR 40; Schomoyer v. Van Hosen, 111 Kan. 759, 208 P 554; State v. Morey, 81 Kan. 149, 105 P 501; Nyhart v. Kubach, 76 Kan. 154, 90 P 796; Pinney v. Concordia First Nat. Bank, 68 Kan. 223, 75 P 119, 1 AnnCas 331.

[b] Agency for sale of patented articles.—A territorial lease and appointment of agency giving the party of the second part six sample machines and the agency for the sale of the same for a term of years, the company agreeing to furnish all machines ordered by the agent at a certain fixed price, is a contract for the sale of a patent right within Gen. St. (1901) §§ 4356–4358, relating to the registration and sale of patent rights. Nyhart v. Kubach, 76 Kan. 154, 90 P 796.

[c] Patent allowed but not issued.—(1) A contract for sale of party's rights in letters patent on an article on which application for letters patent had been made and allowed, but letters not yet issued, held to be one for a sale of patent rights, within the provisions of statutes, requiring incorporation in contract of words "given for a patent right," and filing of copies of letters patent. Hager v. Hale, 110 Kan. 507, 204 P 529. Contra Ullman v. Thompson, 57 Ind. A. 126, 106 NE 611, 614 (holding that "the right to a patent was yet inchoate, and might never become complete, since such favorable action was subject to annulment for cause shown"). (2) Assignment of future patents see supra § 375.

[d] Patent applied for but not issued.—A contract, undertaking to sell the exclusive right for five years to sell within a specified territory an article for which patent has been applied for but not issued, is one for the sale of the patent right within Gen. St. (1915) § 6794, relating to the registration and sale of patent rights. Schomoyer v. Van Hosen, 111 Kan. 759, 208 P 554.

[e] The assignment of part of a certificate of deposit in payment for a patent right is within Gen. St. (1915) § 6795, requiring any allegation in writing for which a patent right forms a consideration to have inserted the words "given for a patent right." Schomoyer v. Van Hosen, 111 Kan. 759, 208 P 554.

[f] Consideration shown on face of contract.—The fact that a contract shows upon its face its character and consideration does not dispense with the statutory requirement that the words "given for a patent right" be inserted. Schomoyer v. Van Hosen, 111 Kan. 759, 208 P 554.

[g] An assignment of letters patent, made after the sale of the patent right has been completed, does not change the character of the sale. Hager v. Hale, 110 Kan. 507, 204 P 529.

[h] Article used in manufacture of patented article.—Where a party having a patent contracts to sell to another party and convey the exclusive right to sell in a certain territory, for a fixed time, molds to be used in the manufacture of a patented article, he undertakes to convey to such party exclusive right to manufacture, sell, and use, the article patented within such territory, and such contract is illegal unless the steps required by Gen. St. (1901) § 4356, have been complied with. Tredick v. Walters, 81 Kan. 828, 106 P 1067.

[i] Statute not confined to negotiable obligations.—Schomoyer v. Van Hosen, 111 Kan. 759, 208 P 554.

"We think the State has the power (certainly until Congress legislates upon the subject) with regard to the provision which shall accompany the regulations has been denied.[3] It has been held that a license tax cannot be imposed by a state upon the right to vend patent rights;[4] nor can a tax be laid upon the capital stock of corporations invested in patent rights.[5] State legislatures may enact statutes whose effect is to pass the title to letters patent,[6] and state courts may hear and determine questions arising out of contracts whose subject matter is patent rights, but may not settle questions as to the validity of the patent rights.[7]

[§ 488] 3. Criminal Prosecution. In some states the statutes regulating dealings in patent rights and patented articles provide for criminal prosecution for failure to comply with the terms of the statutes.[8] Under such a statute, a complaint has been held not indefinite or uncertain because of its referring to the letters patent involved as those of defendant, whereas the contract dealing with the letters referred to the patent as the property of a company of which defendant was president.[9]

XV. INFRINGEMENT

[By STANLEY A. HACKETT]

[§ 489] A. What Constitutes—1. Infringement Generally—a. Definition, Nature, and Distinctions. As applied to a patent,[10] infringement is the unauthorized making, using, or selling for practical use, or for profit, of an invention covered by a valid claim of a patent during the life of the patent.[11] It is a violation of the exclusive right or monopoly created by statute[12] and conferred upon a patentee,[13] and it differs from unfair competition in that no element of monopoly is necessary or involved in the latter.[14] An infringement of a patent is a tort[15] or wrong;[16] it is a trespass upon the property rights of the patentee,[17] or at least it is analogous to a trespass.[18] It is said that there is no such thing as partial infringement.[19]

"Anticipation" is distinguishable from "infringement"[20] in that the former depends upon the nature and extent of the earlier disclosure,[21] while the latter depends upon the character of the grant as fixed by the claim.[22]

[§ 490] b. Requisites—(1) Valid and Existing Patent.[23] A patent must be a valid one in order to support a claim of infringement thereof.[24] Use of the subject of a patent subsequent to its issuance sale or assignment of rights arising under a patent, to make reasonable regulations concerning the subject, calculated to protect its citizens from fraud. . . . The mere provision in the Federal statute for an assignment and its record as against subsequent purchasers, etc., is not such legislation as takes away the rights of the States to legislate on the subject themselves in a manner neither inconsistent with nor opposed to the Federal statute." Allen v. Riley, 203 U. S. 347, 355, 357, 27 SCt 95, 51 L. ed. 216, 8 AnnCas 137 [aff 71 Kan. 378, 80 P 952, 114 AmSR 481, 6 AnnCas 158].

and prior to its expiration may constitute infringement,[25] even though it is a continuation of a use commenced prior to the issuance of the patent;[26] but use pending application for a patent is not infringement,[27] nor is it infringement to use, subsequent to the granting of the patent, something which was old,[28] and which the public had a right to use,[29] prior to the patentee's invention, even though its character and capacities were not generally understood[30] or it was not a commercial success.[31]

After expiration of patent, the subject matter thereof may be manufactured,[32] used,[33] or sold[34] lawfully and without infringement; and a device which admittedly infringed a certain patent cannot, after the expiration of such patent, infringe a subsequent patent, unless it contains some element covered by the subsequent patent which was not included in the expired patent.[35] While articles illegally made during the life of a patent cannot be lawfully sold after the patent has expired,[36] the part manufacture of articles not constituting an infringement, with intent to complete the manufacture of the patented article immediately on the expiration of the patent, is not infringement.[37]

[§ 491] (2) Lack of Authority from Owner of Patent.[38] The manufacture, use, or sale of a patented invention by a person other than the owner of the patent constitutes an infringement of the patent when,[39] and only when,[40] it is not authorized by the owner of the patent.

Authority conferred prior to application for patent. Any person who purchases of the inventor, or with his knowledge and consent constructs an article embodying the invention prior to his application for a patent, has the right to use and sell the particular article after a patent is granted without liability therefor to the inventor or any other person interested in the invention.[41] The rule does not apply to an article made or bought without the inventor's consent;[42] nor does the right conferred thereby extend to further manufacture after the issuance of the patent,[43] unless such manufacture is with the knowledge and consent of the owner of the patent.[44]

[§ 492] (3) Knowledge or Intent of Infringer. Generally speaking, the motive or intent with which an alleged act of infringement is committed is immaterial,[45] except as bearing upon the amount of damages recoverable;[46] a person who is otherwise an infringer is no less so because he does not intend to infringe;[47] and, on the other hand, where a machine, article, or apparatus does not infringe, infringement cannot be predicated upon an intent to infringe,[48] and it is immaterial whether the lack of infringement results from accident or deliberation.[49] However, intent is an element of contributory infringement,[50] and the making or using of a patented invention merely for experimental purposes, without any intent to derive profit or practical advantage therefrom, is not infringement.[51] It is immaterial whether an infringer knows or is ignorant of the fact that the article manufactured or sold infringes a patent;[52] he is chargeable with knowledge of the infringing acts;[53] and a person may infringe a patent without having any actual knowledge of its existence.[54] It is not incumbent upon a patentee to warn infringers,[55] unless he wishes to recover damages, in which case he is required by statute to mark the article "patented" or give notice of the patent and its infringement to the infringers.[56]

[§ 493] (4) Acts—(a) In General. Broadly speaking, the infringement of a patent may consist of any one, two, or all three[57] of the acts of making,[58] using,[59] or selling[60] the patented invention without authority from the owner of the patent.[61] Conversely, there is no infringement unless one of these acts is committed.[62]

[§ 494] (b) Making.[63] Although unaccompanied by use or sale, the unauthorized making of a patented invention for sale, profit, or practical use constitutes infringement of the patent;[64] but the making of a patented invention merely as a bona fide experiment and without any intent to sell it or use it for profit is not infringement.[65] A purchaser of a patented machine has no right to use a portion thereof to complete the manufacture of another machine within the scope of the patent.[66]

Making for sale abroad is infringement.[67]

[a] What constitutes reconstruction or rebuilding.—(1) "Substantial reconstruction is sufficient to make the act one of rebuilding, instead of repair or replacement." C. & R. Research Corp. v. Write, Inc., 19 F. (2d) 380, 381. (2) "The substitution of the vital and distinctively new part of the combination, if the whole invention resides substantially in such part, is a reconstruction of the machine." C. & R. Research Corp. v. Write, Inc., supra. (3) The forbidden realm of reconstruction is invaded where repairs are so extensive as to result in a new and different machine and a loss of identity of the original machine. Ideal Wrapping Mach. Co. v. George Close Co., 23 F. (2d) 848 [aff 29 F. (2d) 533].

[b] Acts constituting infringement.—Changing and reconstructing patented machines and selling them under a different name is infringement. National Phonograph Co. v. Fletcher, 117 Fed. 149.

[c] Ordinary infringement distinguished.—"A purchaser stands in no different position from an ordinary infringer, except in the circumstance that he has bought a patented machine, and, consequently, his infringement does not consist in the construction of a wholly new machine, but in the reconstruction of such machine after it is worn out or substantially destroyed. The essence of the infringement is the same in both cases. The ordinary infringer makes the entire patented machine; the infringing purchaser begins with what remains of the patented machine, and rebuilds it. To show infringement in the case of an ordinary infringer, where the patented invention comprises several elements in combination, it is necessary to prove that the alleged infringing machine contains all the elements (or their equivalents) which make up the combination, although some of the elements may not be material, or of the essence of the invention. To show infringement by the purchaser in such a case, the same strictness of proof is not required, for the reason that it may not be necessary for him to make the immaterial or unessential elements of the patented combination, because they may not be worn out or destroyed in his machine when the work of reconstruction begins." Goodyear Shoe Mach. Co. v. Jackson, 112 Fed. 146, 148, 50 CCA 159, 55 LRA 692.

[d] Contributory infringement distinguished.—(1) "Infringement by the purchaser of a patented machine consists in the substantial rebuilding of such machine. A contributory infringer necessarily only makes or sells a part of the patented invention. The purchaser of a patented machine, in order to infringe, must make or reproduce, in substance, the whole patented invention. To prove infringement, in one case, it is only necessary to show a partial infringement in aid of an unlawful complete infringement, while in the other case a substantially full and complete infringement must be established." Goodyear Shoe Mach. Co. v. Jackson, 112 Fed. 146, 148, 50 CCA 159, 55 LRA 692. (2) Contributory infringement generally see infra §§ 516–519.

"The purchaser may not reconstruct a separately patented part or element of the machine without the consent of the owner of the patent for such part, for such reconstruction would constitute a making of the thing covered by the separate patent, notwithstanding it might properly be considered a repair, when viewed from the standpoint of the machine as a whole." C. & R. Research Corp. v. Write, Inc., 19 F. (2d) 380, 381.

73. Bassick Mfg. Co. v. Ready Auto Supply Co., 22 F. (2d) 331.

[a] Reason for rule is that to allow the replacement of any part would, if carried to its logical conclusion, allow the replacement of all parts, from time to time, and thus extend the life of the machine indefinitely and far beyond its natural and normal life in service. Bassick Mfg. Co. v. Ready Auto Supply Co., 22 F. (2d) 331.

foregoing rules[74] and in distinguishing between legitimate repairs and substantial reconstruction;[75] and it is said that no general rule can be laid down by which to determine the line of demarcation between legitimate repairs which a purchaser of a patented machine may rightfully make thereon, and a reconstruction or reproduction which will constitute infringement;[76] each case must in that regard be decided on its own facts,[77] having reference to the scope and purpose of the invention[78] and the fair and reasonable intention of the parties.[79]

By purchaser of parts. A purchaser of a patented machine or article which has been dismantled or taken to pieces has no right to reconstruct the machine or article by assembling the parts thereof or otherwise.[80]

Making or supplying parts for repairs or replacements.[81] The rights of a maker of, or dealer in, parts of a patented device, other than the owner of the patent or a person authorized by him, correspond with,[82] but cannot exceed,[83] the rights of the owner and user of the device. Such repairs or replacements as the owner of the machine or device is entitled to make[84] may, at his instance, be made for, or be furnished or supplied to, him by another person;[85] but no one, under the guise or claim of merely furnishing needed repair parts to a patented article or machine, may in fact remake the patented device or machine in competition with, or in violation of, the rights of the owner of the patent;[86] the supplying of a nonperishable element to a user is infringement;[87] and a person is an infringer where he repairs an infringing article, machine, or device.[88] An assembly unit or component part made up of smaller parts cannot be rightfully made or marketed by a third person,[89] unless all the smaller parts making the assembly are needed at one time for the purpose of immediate repair.[90]

Patented process cannot be used in repairing.[91]

[§ 496] (d) Use.[92] A patent is infringed by the unauthorized use of the patented invention, even though it was made by a third person,[93] or by a use for personal benefit or convenience without a sale.[94] Infringement is not avoided by imperfectly practicing or using the invention;[95] refraining from confiscating the whole value of the patented device;[96] using the patented machine or device only part of the time[97] or to accomplish only part of the results it was intended to accomplish;[98] or, except where the patent covers merely a particular combination of elements,[99] by using only part of the invention embraced within the patent.[1] The use of an invention for an analogous purpose is infringement,[2] but use for a nonanalogous purpose, where invention is necessary to procure its adaptability, is not infringement.[3] A mere proposal or intent to use, not followed by actual use, does not constitute infringement.[4] Also, mere possession not coupled with actual use does not constitute infringement.[5]

Place of use. Infringement may exist where some benefit is derived from patented articles while they are within the country covered by the patent,[6] even though they are only temporarily in the country and are to be transshipped to foreign parts,[7] and even though the use thereof is passive rather than active.[8] Also, a use of a patented article within the country covered by the patent without authority from the patentee constitutes infringement, even though the article was purchased in another country from a foreign patentee or person authorized by him to make the sale.[9] On the other hand, a use in another country, beyond the protection of the patent, is not infringement.[10] Use on a domestic vessel at sea is infringement;[11] but use on a foreign vessel in a domestic port is not.[12]

Experimental use of a patented invention for the sole purpose of gratifying curiosity or a philosophical taste, or for mere amusement, is not an infringement.[13] This rule, however, cannot be invoked for the protection of one who uses a patented invention commercially,[14] as in the course of business[15] or for profit.[16] Indeed, if the use is of advantage to the user, it need not necessarily be profitable in order to fall without the rule permitting experimental use.[17]

Use by purchaser or licensee. A person who has purchased a patented article or machine from the owner of the patent has a right to use it[18] until it is worn out[19] or has lived its normal life in service,[20] and where he has purchased without restrictions he is entitled to make any use thereof he deems fit;[21] but where a person has acquired a patented machine or device subject to, or with knowledge of, restrictions upon its use, a violation of such restrictions by him,[22] or by any person with actual knowledge thereof,[23] constitutes infringement; and a person who is without right to reconstruct a patented machine or article by assembling parts which he has purchased[24] has no right to use the machine or article so reconstructed by him.[25] Except in some jurisdictions,[26] where a patent covers a process merely and not the product thereof, a purchaser and user of an article or product made by infringing the process is not an infringer.[27] Also, a person who merely entered into a bona fide agreement to purchase all the articles which another might be able to make, within a limited period of time, with any machine which the latter might choose to employ, cannot be held to have used a patented machine in violation of the rights of the patentee.[28]

held that a tenant who merely occupies an entire building without moving, manipulating, or making any special or independent use of parts thereof containing patented features, such as slabs, floors, or columns, does not make such use of the patented invention as to constitute infringement;[29] but it is also held that the use of a building containing a patented floor by a person as owner and occupier after its construction constitutes infringement.[30]

[§ 497] (e) Sale. A sale constituting an infringement of a patent may consist of a single sale,[31] the giving away of infringing articles as premiums with other goods sold,[32] or a sale by a licensee which is beyond the terms of his license.[33] An unauthorized sale is an infringement, although the article was made by another person,[34] or, where the sale is in the country protected by the patent, although the article was manufactured in, and imported from, another country;[35] and infringement of the patent by sale of an infringing device or article cannot be evaded, or accountability therefor escaped, by a sale of the device or article in parts,[36] the giving of directions to the purchaser as to the use thereof,[37] or entire nonuse[38] or use by the seller or purchaser in some way other than that suggested by the patentee.[39] On the other hand, it is not infringement merely to expose to sale[40] or propose to sell;[41] nor is a sale by a sheriff on execution actionable infringement;[42] and a patent for a machine or process alone is not violated by a sale of the product of an infringing machine or process.[43] A sale in a country other than the one which granted the patent is not infringement.[44]

Time of sale. A sale is made, so as to constitute an act of infringement of a patent, when the contract of sale is made,[45] irrespective of the time of delivery.[46]

Resale. Ordinarily a buyer of a patented article, product, or machine made and sold under a valid license may resell without infringing;[47] but a resale in violation of restrictions imposed thereon constitutes infringement,[48] unless the restrictions are invalid.[49] It is an infringement to sell, in the country granting the patent, a patented article purchased or acquired in a foreign country from one not claiming under the domestic patentee;[50] but the sale, in the country granting the patent, of an article purchased abroad from the domestic patentee is not an infringement,[51] unless the purchase was coupled with a restriction forbidding use or sale in the country granting the patent;[52] and a resale abroad of an article purchased abroad does not infringe a domestic patent.[53] to infringe is substantially identical with the patented invention,[55] even though there are some differences in form[56] or variations in detail.[57] Conversely, to constitute infringement, there must be at least substantial identity,[58] quantitative as well as qualitative;[59] the variations, if any, must be such as are consistent with substantial identity;[60] and no matter how closely infringement may be approached,[61] it is avoided if the substance of the patented invention is not taken.[62] More specifically, there must be substantial identity not only in the results obtained,[63] but also in the means[64] and principle or mode of operation[65] employed to obtain the results; and where substantial identity exists in all these matters, infringement may exist.[66]

Changes after construction.[67] A machine or article is not of an infringing character merely because it is capable of being changed into one;[68] and where a machine, as originally designed and constructed, does not infringe, the fact that rightful wear and usage results in such identity as to bring it within the scope of the patent does not constitute infringement;[69] but the maker is liable, if, with intent to infringe, he makes a colorably different machine, which will inevitably become an infringement in the course of usage,[70] or can easily be so adjusted as to infringe.[71]

[§ 499] (b) Comparison with Claims or Commercial Structure of Patentee.[72] Infringement of a patent depends upon a violation of the claims of the patent[73] in question,[74] and in determining the question of infringement, defendant's structure or machine is to be compared with the language of the claims of the patent,[75] rather than with plaintiff's commercial structure or machine,[76] especially where plaintiff's machine is not manufactured strictly in accordance with his patent.[77] However, it is said that the question of infringement is not a verbal one,[78] and cannot be determined by the test of the words used in the claim.[79] At any rate, while nothing can be held an infringement that does not fall within the terms which the patentee has chosen to express his invention,[80] yet devices not described, but plainly within the concept in so far as it is patentable and is defined in the claims, may infringe the patent,[81] and if another than the patentee, without his consent, makes something which is substantially the patented thing, and is within a fair description thereof, infringement cannot be escaped because there may be verbal differences between the language of the claims and the words in which the infringing thing may be described.[82] Also, there may be no infringement, even though the language of the claims of a valid patent may literally be read upon, or applied to, an alleged infringing device, machine, or structure;[83] but where a claim reads literally and functionally upon defendant's device, Co., 169 Fed. 288, 94 CCA 578 [aff 159 Fed. 736] (the claims of a patent should cover only what the patentee has in fact invented, and not what he imagines he has invented; and the inventor of a practical working machine will not be held to have infringed a prior patent for an unsuccessful machine, which added nothing of substantial value to the art, merely because the language of its claims is broad enough to include the successful structure).

"It is well settled that it does not something which is not in the claim will not be read into it for the purpose of permitting defendant to escape infringement.[84] Each claim of the patent is separately considered in determining infringement,[85] and while a claim describing the invention in broad terms may be infringed by devices differing in many respects from that of the patent,[86] a claim including a distinct limitation to a particular feature is not infringed unless that feature is used.[87]

[§ 500] (c) Purpose, Function, and Result.[88] For a device or machine to infringe a patent, it must perform the same, or substantially the same, function,[89] or accomplish the same result,[90] or at least a substantially identical result,[91] or the same broad result,[92] or the same kind of result,[93] as the patented invention; but there is sufficient identity of function where a machine or device performs the primary function of the patented machine or device,[94] although it does not perform all of the functions thereof,[95] or where it performs the same function to an appreciable extent,[96] although there is impairment of function in degree;[97] there is sufficient identity of result where the result is the same in kind, although not in degree;[98] and the accomplishment of an additional result does not avoid infringement when the substance of the invention is taken.[99] Ordinarily, infringement cannot be predicated upon identity or similarity of function,[1] or result or effect[2] alone; substantial identity in other matters, such as means and methods or mode of op-necessarily follow from the fact that an alleged infringing device comes literally within the terms of a patent claim that there is infringement." Standard Tobacco Stemmer Co. v. Tobacco Stemming Mach. Co, supra.

"The mere fact that the same result is obtained by the operation of an apparatus is not conclusive of infringeeration is also necessary to constitute infringement.[3] However, where a patent covers a product only, identity of product alone is sufficient identity to constitute infringement.[4]

Purpose. There is no infringement when there is a substantial difference in purpose[5] or accomplishment.[6]

Capacity to infringe by use.[7] The interchangeability in use of two devices is an important test in determining the question of infringement.[8] A machine, device, or apparatus may be of an infringing character where it is capable of infringing when used in a proper, ordinary, normal, and effective way,[9] or is capable of an infringing use and is sold with the intent that it shall be so used,[10] even if it is also capable of being so used as not to infringe,[11] and the seller goes through the form of instructing that it shall be used in a noninfringing way.[12] On the other hand, a device designed to be used in a manner which will not infringe is not of an infringing character merely because it is capable of infringing by use in another manner which is more difficult and without object or advantage;[13] and a device does not infringe where it is not capable of use in the same situation[14] or for the same purpose[15] as that for which the patented device is specifically intended.

[§ 501] (d) Means and Operation.[16] To infringe a patent, a device or machine must not only perform the same, or substantially the same, function or accomplish the same result as the patented invention,[17] but it must also perform the function or accomplish the result by identical, or substantially identical, means;[18] and furthermore the principle or mode of operation must be the same, or substantially the same,[19] or, in other words, the function ment. Infringement cannot be predicated on results obtained, irrespective of the apparatus employed." Marconi Wireless Tel. Co. v. Kilbourne, etc., Mfg. Co., 239 Fed. 328, 354 [aff 265 Fed. 644].

[a] "Test of infringement, when alleged against the manufacturer of a machine, and based solely upon the machine itself, is whether, as made and when offered for sale, it contains the patented invention. If its structure is such that, when used in the manner contemplated by the manufacturer, it has the capacity of appropriating the invention, he can be treated as an infringer by participation with the user. But if its structure is such that it can only acquire that capacity by misuse, whether negligent or intentional, he is not responsible as an infringer." Brown v. [a] Rule applied.—(1) Where the claims of the patentee are limited to a cylinder-actuating rod provided with a spiral groove, and the coacting means by which motion is imparted to the cylinder, defendant does not infringe where its structure does not have the rod provided with a spiral, and consequently the means for producing rotary movement of the cylinder are different. (2) "Any device which accomplishes the same result by means of different mechanism is not an infringement" of a patent involving mere improvements. Anakin Lock Works v. Dillon Lock Works, 292 Fed. 45, 47 [aff 283 Fed. 629].

[b] Substantially equivalent means.—Patents cover the means employed to effect results, and to be an infringer one must reach the same result by the same or substantially equivalent means. Dey Time-Register Co. v. W. H. Bundy Recording Co., 169 Fed. 807 [aff 178 Fed. 812, 102 CCA 260].

must be performed or the result must be accomplished in substantially the same way,[20] or by a substantially identical method.[21] However, where there is otherwise sufficient identity in all essential matters,[22] infringement may exist, although preferred methods described by the patentee are not adopted.[23]

[§ 502] (e) Form. Unless form is of the essence of the invention,[24] or is the distinguishing characteristic thereof,[25] or form and substance are inseparable,[26] mere differences in form are immaterial[27]

[c] Difference in construction and operation.—A device or structure does not infringe where it differs from the patented invention in both construction and operation. Turner v. Spinner, 6 F. (2d) 172; Edwards Mfg. Co. v. National Fireworks Distributing Co., 272 Fed. 23 [rev on other grounds 2 F. (2d) 815].

[d] Different application of principle.—A patent for an invention consisting of a new application of a well-known principle for a particular purpose is not infringed by a device that applies the same principle for the same purpose, but by quite a different method of application. P. & M. Co. v. Canada Mach. Corp., Ltd., (Can.) [1925] 4 DomLR 481 [aff [1925] Exch. 47].

[e] Different principles for grinding lenses.—A patent for an improvement in a machine for grinding optical lenses, operating on the ring-grinding principle, is not infringed by a machine operating on the lap-grinding principle, which is a distinct field in the art. Paige v. Brown, 272 Fed. 686 [aff 260 Fed. 955].

[f] Continuous or intermittent operation.—Machines or devices in which the different parts are arranged and constructed to operate continuously are different in principle from those in which the parts are arranged to operate intermittently and alternately with each other, and one is not an infringement of the other. American Steel, etc., Co. v. Denning Wire, etc., Co., 176 Fed. 564.

Defendants discover that, by operating the mechanism in a different way, precisely the same result may be achieved. Certainly defendants may not escape the charge of infringement by operating the mechanism differently from the way pointed out by the inventor, and obtaining a result identical with that obtained through the other method of operation").

or of little weight,[28] and do not avoid infringement[29] where the principle or mode of operation is appropriated and the same result is obtained by the same or equivalent means.[30] The rule applies to differences in appearance,[31] name,[32] shape,[33] proportions,[34] dimensions,[35] and to mere structural differences generally.[36] The resemblance or substantial similarity of two machines or devices in physical appearance does not necessarily show infringement,[37] as they may operate upon different principles[38] or achieve different results.[39]

[§ 503] (f) Superiority or Inferiority—aa. In General. Ordinarily the relative superiority of complainant's and defendant's devices is irrelevant to the question of infringement of a patent;[40] and where the essential features of the patented invention are appropriated and used, infringement is not avoided by the fact that the infringing device, ar-ric form is best for purpose, other forms producing the same result may be infringements. Eddy v. Dennis, 95 U. S. 560, 24 L. ed. 363.

more parts or features[63] without change or addition of function,[64] and an addition which merely makes the patented structure more complicated and cumbersome.[65] As hereinafter shown, an addition which changes or destroys a combination, and makes a new combination, avoids infringement of a patent for a combination.[66]

Omission. A claim is not infringed when an element included therein is omitted and no equivalent is used.[67] The rule applies where the part or element omitted is essential;[68] and, except in some jurisdictions,[69] it also applies where the element omitted is not really essential.[70] However, the omission of elements or features not claimed does not avoid infringement;[71] and the impairment of the function of a part of a patented structure by omitting a portion will not avoid infringement.[72]

[§ 507] cc. Joinder or Division. Ordinarily infringement of a patent is not avoided by joining, combining, or consolidating two parts, elements, or features into one integral part[73] where the single part performs the functions,[74] accomplishes the objects or purposes,[75] or secures the results[76] of both in the same, or substantially the same, way,[77] and in practical operation it makes no difference whether one form of construction or the other is adopted;[78] but it is otherwise if the patentee has intentionally made the separability of the two parts an essential feature of his invention.[79] Likewise infringement is not avoided by the division or separation of an integral part or element into two or more parts or elements,[80] where the same work is done,[81] or, in other words, the same function is performed[82] or the same result is produced[83] in substantially the same way or manner.[84]

[§ 508] dd. Transposition. Where there is no change in function and no substantial change in operation, infringement is not avoided by a mere transposition, rearrangement, or change in location of parts or elements,[85] such as a mere reversal of position or operation;[86] but infringement is avoided by a rearrangement or change of position which produces a substantially different mode of operation,[87] even though the result is the same or similar;[88] and where a specific location is claimed as essential to the conception, a change therefrom that is not a mere subterfuge will avoid infringement.[89]

[§ 509] ee. Substitution of Equivalents[90]—(aa) In General. Infringement is not evaded by substituting equivalent elements for those set forth in the patented claim,[91] even though the substitution is disguised to some extent.[92] To come within the rule, the part, element, or material substituted must be an equivalent of that omitted;[93] it must be known as such;[94] and, except in some jurisdictions,[95] it must have been known, at the date of the patent, as a proper substitute;[96] but if it was so known to others, it need not have been known to the patentee.[97] A patentee cannot claim equivalency in respect of an element or feature which he has voluntarily relinquished,[98] abandoned at the request of the patent office in order to obtain the patent,[99] or from which he has differentiated his invention in order to obtain a patent.[1] In some situations equivalency is not mutual,[2] and a finding as to whether an earlier device, if later, would have infringed a later patent is not helpful in determining whether the device of the later patent infringes the earlier one.[3]

Nature and extent of invention.[4] The doctrine of equivalents is not confined to pioneer patents,[5] but may be applied to secondary or improvement patents,[6] and any patent,[7] however narrow,[8] has some range of equivalents, unless form is made indispensable.[9] However, the range of equivalents depends upon, and varies with, the degree of invention,[10] or the nature and extent of the invention;[11] a primary, generic, or pioneer patent is entitled to a broad range of equivalents,[12] while a secondary or improvement patent is accorded a more narrow and restricted range[13] proportioned to the advance which it makes in the art.[14]

[§ 510] (bb) Tests for Determining Equivalency. Similarities or differences are to be determined, not by the names of things,[15] but in the light of what the elements do,[16] and substantial, rather than technical, identity is the test.[17] More specifically, it is necessary and sufficient to constitute equivalency that the same function be performed[18] in substantially the same way or manner,[19] or by the same, or substantially the same, principle or mode of operation;[20] but where these tests are satisfied, mere differences

[a] Continuous and intermittent operation.—"Counsel urges that it cannot be declared as a matter of law that a machine which operates continuously cannot be the equivalent of one that operates intermittently, and we are not disposed to question that statement. Much would depend of form are immaterial;[21] a part is no less equivalent because it performs additional functions;[22] and parts may be equivalents whether made integral or separate.[23] The interchangeability of the parts or elements of a patented machine or device and those of a machine or device alleged to infringe is a test sometimes applied in determining infringement;[24] noninterchangeability of parts tends to negative infringement;[25] and there is no infringement where reorganization is necessary to effect the substitution.[26] Mere identity or similarity of result is not alone sufficient to constitute equivalency.[27] Equivalency cannot be determined by comparing defendant's present device with his former device which he admitted was an infringement.[28] In applying the foregoing rules and tests, equivalency has been held to exist in some cases[29] and not to exist in upon the structure of the particular machine. If it was simple, the change from intermittent to continuous action might be produced by the mere substitution of a well-known mechanical equivalent, or a slight mechanical adjustment. But the likelihood of the result being thus produced decreases as the complexity of the machine increases; and, when mechanisms attain the complexity of those involved in the present suit, the difference in the mode of operation is very strong evidence, indeed, that there is such a difference in the machines as will avoid the charge of infringement." [§ 511] (h) Patents of Particular Matters—aa. Combination—(aa) In General. There can be no infringement of a patent for a combination unless the combination is infringed;[31] and the combination is not infringed by another combination which is substantially different.[32] As in the case of patents generally,[33] substantial identity of means,[34] operation,[35] and result[36] is necessary to constitute infringement of a patent for a combination, or, in other words, not only must the same elements or their equivalents be employed,[37] but there must be also a performance of substantially the same function or functions[38] in substantially the same way.[39] Also, as in the case of patents generally,[40] mere identity or similarity of result alone is not sufficient to constitute infringement.[41] The addition to a patented combination of a new function which does not

"A claim for combination is not infringed if any one of the elements is omitted without substitution of an equivalent." National Cash Register Co. v. Gratigny, 213 Fed. 463, 465, 130 CCA 109.

"A combination may be infringed when some of the elements are employed and for the others mechanical equivalents are used which were known to be such at the time when the patent was granted." Rowell v. Lindsay, 113 U. S. 97, 102, 5 SCt 507, 28 L. ed. 906.

[a] Equivalency generally.—(1) The rules relating to equivalency generally (see supra §§ 498–510) apply to patents of combinations (Smith Cannery Mach. Co. v. Seattle-Astoria Iron Works, 261 Fed. 85; Ottumwa Box Car Loader Co. v. Christy Box Car Loader Co., 215 Fed. 362, 131 CCA 504; Denning Wire, etc., Co. v. American Steel, etc., Co., 160 Fed. 108 [aff 169 Fed. 793, 95 CCA 259]; National Hollow Brake-Beam Co. v. Interchangeable Brake-Beam Co., 106 Fed. 693, 45 CCA 544), (2) and patentees of combinations are undoubtedly as much entitled to the benefit of equivalents as are the patentees of all other classes of invention (Imhaeuser v. Buerk, 101 U. S. 647, 25 L. ed. 945; Gill v. Wells, 22 Wall. (U. S.) 1, 22 L. ed. 699; Rees v. Gould, 15 Wall. (U. S.) 187, 21 L. ed. 39; Seymour v. Osborne, 11 Wall. (U. S.) 516, 20 L. ed. 33; Yancey v. Enright, 230 Fed. 841, 145 CCA 51 [certiorari den 241 U. S. 678 mem, 36 SCt 727 mem, 60 L. ed. 1233 mem]; Brammer v. Schroeder, 106 Fed. 918, 46 CCA 41; Bundy Mfg. Co. v. Detroit Time-Register Co., 94 Fed. 524, 36 CCA 375; Boston, etc., Electric St. R. Co. v. Bemis Car-Box Co., 80 Fed. 287, 25 CCA 420; Norton v. Jensen, 49 Fed. 859, 1 CCA 452; Tatum v. Gregory, 41 Fed. 142; Ligowski Clay-Pigeon Co. v. American Clay-Bird Co., 34 Fed. 328; Dederick v. Cassell, 9 Fed. 306; American Whip Co. v. Lombard, 1 F. Cas. No. 319, 3 Bann. & A. 598, 4 Cliff. 495; Goodyear Dental Vulcanite Co. v. Preterre, 10 F. Cas. No. 5,596, 3 Bann. & A. 471, 15 Blatchf. 274; King v. Louisville Cement Co., 14 F. Cas. No. 7,798, 6 Fish. Pat. Cas. 336; Sayles v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 21 F. Cas. No. 12,415, 3 Biss. 52, 4 Fish. Pat. Cas. 584 [rev on other grounds 97 U. S. 554, 24 L. ed. 1053]; Storrs v. Howe, 23 F. Cas. No. 13,495, 2 Bann. & A. 420, 4 Cliff. 388; Union Sugar Refinery v. Matthiesson, 24 F. Cas. No. 14,399, 3 Cliff. 639, 2 Fish. Pat. Cas. 600). (3) In one case, however, it was said that "when an invention relates to the production of an old result by means of a novel combination of old parts, or to a machine utilizing an old principle or system . . . it may be no infringement to achieve the same result by the use of well known equivalents. In other words when the invention claimed is the particular arrangement of old parts previously used in combination, the doctrine of infringement by the substitution of equivalents is not applicable, and the patentee cannot complain of the use of different mechanical appliances in lieu of one or more of the parts. Mere colourable evasions would not of course afford a defence." Gerrard v. Laidlaw Bale-Tie Co., Ltd., [1926] Can. Exch. 193, 197, [1926] 4 DomLR 5.

[b] Range of equivalents.—(1) Ordinarily the range of equivalents accorded a patent of a combination of old elements is narrow (William B. Scaife, etc., Co. v. Falls City Woolen Mills Co., 194 Fed. 139 [rev on other grounds 209 Fed. 210, 126 CCA 304]; Dey Time Register Co. v. Syracuse Time Recorder Co., 152 Fed.

same, way[47] and coact or coöperate in substantially the same way[48] to produce a result of substantially the same nature.[49] There is no infringement where the combination claimed is changed or destroyed by an addition making a new combination;[50] but where the essence of the combination is not changed, infringement of a patent for a combination is not avoided by the mere addition of another element,[51] a change in the location or sequence of the elements,[52] the joinder of two parts or elements into one which performs the function or accomplishes the purpose of both in substantially the same way,[53] or the separation of one integral part into two, which together accomplish substantially what was done by 440 [aff 161 Fed. 111, 88 CCA 275]), (2) and no great liberality in applying the doctrine of mechanical equivalents can be indulged in its favor (Turner v. Spinner, 6 F. (2d) 172). (3) Also, a patentee of an improvement, consisting of a combination of old elements with a single new element, is not entitled to claim equivalents to the same extent as if it was a pioneer or original patent. American Stoker Co. v. Underfeed Stoker Co., 182 Fed. 642 [aff 188 Fed. 314, 110 CCA 292]. (4) However, a patentee of a combination which marks a distinct and substantial advance in the art is entitled to a larger range of equivalents (Maunula v. Sunell, 155 Fed. 535), (5) commensurate with the scope of his invention (Smith v. American Electric Rabbit Racing Assoc., 21 F. (2d) 366 [aff 26 F. (2d) 1016 mem (certiorari den 49 SCt 27 mem)]; Veneer Mach. Co. v. Grand Rapids Chair Co., 227 Fed. 419, 142 CCA 115), (6) and in such case the term "mechanical equivalent" should have a reasonably broad and generous interpretation (Smith Cannery Mach. Co. v. Seattle-Astoria Iron Works, 261 Fed. 85).

[c] What constitutes equivalency.—In order to be the equivalent of an element or ingredient of a combination another element or ingredient must: (1) Perform the same function. Rowell v. Lindsay, 113 U. S. 97, 5 SCt 507, 28 L. ed. 906; Imhaeuser v. Buerk, 101 U. S. 647, 25 L. ed. 945; Nicholas v. E. W. Brown Co., 30 F. (2d) 291; American Can Co. v. McGinnis, 156 Fed. 784 [aff 162 Fed. 1006, 87 CCA 118]; Maunula v. Sunell, 155 Fed. 535; Dey Time Register Co. v. Syracuse Time Recorder Co., 152 Fed. 440 [aff 161 Fed. 111, 88 CCA 275]. And see cases infra this note (2). (2) Perform it in substantially the same way. Eames v. Godfrey, 1 Wall. (U. S.) 78, 17 L. ed. 547; Westinghouse Electric, etc., Co. v. Cutter Electric, etc., Co., 169 Fed. 634, 95 CCA 162; American Can Co. v. McGinnis, 156 Fed. 784 [aff 162 Fed. 1006, 87 CCA 118]; Maunula v. Sunell, 155 Fed. 535; Dey Time Register Co. v. Syracuse Time Recorder Co., 152 Fed. 440 [aff 161 Fed. 111, 88 CCA 275]; Noonan v. Chester Park Athletic Club Co., 99 Fed. 90, 39 CCA 426; Norton v. Wheaton, 97 Fed. 636; Engle Sanitary, etc., Co. v. Elwood, 73 Fed. 484; Erie Rubber Co. v. American Dunlop Tire Co., 70 Fed. 58, 16 CCA 632; Wells v. Curtis, 66 Fed. 318, 13 CCA 494; National Cash-Register Co. v. American Cash-Register Co., 53 Fed. 367, 3 CCA 559 [rev 47 Fed. 212], Dudley E. Jones Co. v. Munger Improved Cotton Mach. Mfg. Co., 49 Fed. 61, 1 CCA 158, 50 Fed. 785, 1 CCA 668; Cahoon v. Ring, 4 F. Cas. No. 2,292, 1 Cliff. 592, 1 Fish. Pat. Cas. 397; Conover v. Rapp, 6 F. Cas. No. 3,124, 4 Fish. Pat. Cas. 57; Smith v. Fay, 22 F. Cas. No. 13,045, 6 Fish. Pat. Cas. 446. (3) And have been known, at the date of the patent, as a proper substitute. Imhaeuser v. Buerk, 101 U. S. 647, 25 L. ed. 945; Fuller v. Yentzer, 94 U. S. 288, 24 L. ed. 103; Gill v. Wells, 22 Wall. S. 7, 24 L. ed. 942]. (4) "But this does not mean that where one part, or one element, of a combination, not only performs the same function or functions of the corresponding element in the patent, but some added function, which does not change the mode of operation of the entire combination, equivalency is not made out. The fact that a substituted element performs the same and also an additional function does not necessarily prevent its being an equivalent in the combination, or prevent the combination containing such substituted element being the equivalent of the combination of the patent in suit and alleged to be infringed by the former combination. To hold otherwise would enable persons to successfully infringe almost any combination patent by substituting an element in the combination of the patent which, without changing the combination, or its mode of operation, or the results obtained, in essentials, still performs some added function, which may be immaterial, or which may be an improvement." Corrington v. Westinghouse Air Brake Co., 173 Fed. 69, 81 [rev on other grounds 178 Fed. 711, 103 CCA 479 (certiorari den 219 U. S. 584, 31 SCt 469, 55 L. ed. 346)]. (5) "Where a combination of a plurality of mechanisms constitutes the invention, each mechanism is to be individually considered to determine equivalency, though the result of the plural operations working conjunctively is identical in the patented and accused devices." Diamond Match Co. v. Sun Match Corp., 16 F. (2d) 1, 3 [aff 9 F. (2d) 695]. (6) A pulley revolving on a central shaft and one having trunions revolving in bearings at the ends are well known mechanical equivalents, and the substitution of one for the other, which is an element in a patented combination, does not avoid infringement. Robins Conveying Belt Co. v. American Road Mach. Co., 145 Fed. 923, 76 CCA 461 [aff 142 Fed. 221]. (7) The substitution of nonautomatic devices, operating in a different way, for automatic devices covered by a combination patent is not infringement. Dudlo Mfg. Co. v. Varley Duplex Magnet Co., 253 Fed. 745, 165 CCA 339.

[a] Operation in precisely same way is not necessary; operation in substantially the same way is sufficient. Safety Car Heating, etc., Co. v. Gould Coupler Co., 230 Fed. 848.

[b] Continuous or single and successive action.—Infringement may exist although all the elements of complainant's device act all the time and at times the elements of defendant's device act singly and successively, as where such constant action in complainant's device is not essential, and in defendant's device there is no independence of action and at times the elements necessarily act together and influence the operation of each other. Safety Car Heating, etc., Co. v. Gould Coupler Co., 230 Fed. 848.

the single element.[54]

Materiality of element. The rule that a patent of a combination is not infringed unless every part or element mentioned in the claim is used[55] applies, not only to a part or element claimed which is material or essential,[56] but also to an element claimed which is in fact immaterial or unnecessary;[57] a patentee will not be heard to deny the materiality of any element included in his claim.[58]

Combination comprising new parts. Where some of the parts of the combination are new, and those parts are taken and used in the same manner, but with different things from the rest of the combination patented, and a part of the patented invention is taken although the whole is not, it is an infringement to that extent.[59]

[§ 513] bb. Process.[60] A claim to an art, process, or method is not infringed except by the use of all of the steps thereof or their equivalents;[61] but only "substantial," as distinguished from "absolute," identity is necessary;[62] and where the substance of the invention is taken, and the process is not essentially varied, infringement is not avoided by additions,[63] the division of a step into two operations,[64] or by a reversal or transposition of the steps of the process,[65] unless, in the last instance, it is necessary to follow the order described to obtain the particular result or product sought.[66] Also, if the patented process is substantially taken, infringement is not avoided by a mere variance from the best manner of practicing it,[67] or by a failure to utilize the patented method in its most advantageous form;[68] and where a patented process is neither dependent upon, nor limited to, any specific apparatus or machinery for carrying it into effect, it is infringed by the use of different apparatus for practicing the same process.[69]

Comparison with claim.[70] There is no infringement where, although both complainant and defendant are employing substantially the same process, neither is employing the process described and limited in the claims of the patent.[71]

Identity of product or result is not the test of infringement of a patent for a process,[72] or, at least, identity or similarity of product or result does not alone constitute infringement,[73] but it may indicate or tend to show identity of process,[74] and, likewise, lack of identity in the products is evidence of lack of identity in the processes.[75]

[§ 514] cc. Product or Composition of Matter. A claim to an article, substance, or product composed of a particular ingredient or ingredients is infringed by, and only by, an article, substance, or product having the same characteristics[76] and composed of the same or equivalent ingredients.[77]

Tests and standard of comparison. To determine infringement, comparison of defendant's product must be made with the claim language of the patent in suit,[78] and not with plaintiff's commercial product.[79] In some cases chemical or laboratory tests are necessary to determine infringement of the claims of a patent for a composition of matter,[80] and infringement cannot be avoided because of the necessity of such tests.[81] Any method of test which will fairly determine the question may be employed.[82]

Addition of other ingredients to those claimed does not avoid infringement if the essential character of the compound remains the same;[83] but an addition changing the character of the compound is no infringement.[84]

Different process. An article, compound, or product which is the same, or substantially the same, as that covered by the patent infringes, even though it is made by a different process;[85] the processes are immaterial,[86] except as they show either identity or difference in the characteristics of the two products.[87] This is true where the patent covers the product only, and not the process,[88] or where the chief claim is for the product and the method of producing it is secondary;[89] but a patent for a product produced by a particular process is not infringed by a product produced by a substantially different process.[90]

[§ 515] dd. Design. It is essential to infringement of a design patent that there be an appropriation of the novel elements of the patented design;[91] but servile imitation is not required.[92] Aside from a case of exact copying, a design infringes a design patent when, and only when, it so nearly resembles the patented design in appearance that an ordinary observer, giving such attention to the matter as is usually or ordinarily given by a would-be purchaser of an article embodying or containing the design, would be deceived or led to mistake one for the other,[93] and induced to purchase in the belief or sup-

[b] Equivalent ingredients (1) are those known in the art as possessing the desired properties. Goodyear Dental Vulcanite Co. v. Davis, 102 U. S. 222, 26 L. ed. 149; United Nickel Co. v. position that one is the other.[94] Difference in structure or appearance which will enable experts to distinguish between the patented design and a design alleged to infringe will not prevent infringement;[95] and where two designs are substantially similar, the fact that different names or trade-marks are or may be used in connection with them will not sufficiently distinguish them;[96] but confusion which is due to lack of attention by purchasers or other causes than similarity of the designs will not show infringement.[97]

[§ 516] 2. Contributory Infringement—a. In General. Contributory infringement is the intentional aiding of one person by another in the unlawful making or selling or using of the patented invention;[98] and a contributory infringer is a person who induces, aids, or contributes to wrongful acts of another which constitute infringement of a patent.[99] The essence of contributory infringement lies in concerting with others in an unlawful invasion of the patentee's rights;[1] an intent to aid is necessary;[2] and before one may be held for contributory infringement, it must appear that he has knowingly done some act without which the infringement would

"The differences in designs, which under the patent law will avoid infringement, are differences which will attract the attention of the ordinary observer, giving such attention as the purchaser usually gives in buying articles of the kind in question and for the purposes for which they are intended." Zidell v. Dexter, 262 Fed. 145, 147.

"The test of infringement is not whether dissimilarities between two designs may or not be found. The courts hold, on the question of infringement, that if, in the eye of an ordinary observer, two designs are substantially similar, and if the resemblance is such as to deceive an observer, the first design patented may be held to be infringed by the other. And it is the duty of the court to inquire whether or not defendant's design so nearly resembles plaintiff's design as to lead ordinary purchasers to mistake one for the other." Try-Me Beverage, etc., Co. v. Metropole, 25 F. (2d) 138, 140.

"If in the eyes of an ordinary observer, giving such attention as a purchaser usually gives, two designs are substantially the same, the one first patented is infringed by the other." Whiting Mfg. Co. v. Alvin Silver Co., Inc., 283 Fed. 75, 81 [certiorari den 260 U. S. 731 mem, 43 SCt 93 mem, 67 L. ed. 486 mem].

[a] Leading cases.—(1) Gorham Mfg. Co. v. White, 14 Wall. (U. S.) 511, 20 L. ed. 731 is a leading case on the subject. Macbeth-Evans Glass Co. v. Rosenbaum Co., 199 Fed. 154. (2) Smith v. Whitman Saddle Co., 148 U. S. 674, 13 SCt 768, 37 L. ed. 606 is also a leading case. Zidell v. Dexter, 262 Fed. 145 [aff 259 Fed. 582].

[b] Every, or ordinary, purchaser.—It is not necessary to constitute infringement of a design patent that the similarity be so precise that every purchaser would be misled, but it is sufficient if the ordinary purchaser would be. Knapp v. Will, etc., Co., 253 Fed. 191 [rev on other grounds 273 Fed. 380].

[c] Patent covering slight modification.—"When a design invention consists in nothing more than the bringing together of elements old in the art with slight modification of shape in adapting them or adjusting them to each other . . . any subsequent use of the same basic elements with a variation of form of adaptation departing, to the discernment of an ordinary observer, from the slight change employed in the patent, is not an infringement." Phœnix Knitting Works v. Rich, 194 Fed. 708, 712 [app dism 202 Fed. 1022, 120 CCA 663].

[d] Changes in, or additions to, exact copy.—(1) Changes in a design after desisting from producing an exact copy of the patented design, and while the trade demand for the latter was at its height, invite close scrutiny of a claim of noninfringement. American Fabrics Co. v. Richmond Lace Works, 24 F. (2d) 365, 367. (2) The addition to an otherwise exact copy of a patented design of a small detail, which changes its appearance so little that it still not only resembles, but would be taken for, the design of the patent, does not avoid infringement. Robert Findlay Mfg. Co. v. Hygrade Lighting Fixture Corp., 275 Fed. 362. (3) "But if defendants' changes result in producing a substantially different effect upon the eye, so that the two patterns are reasonably distinguishable, infringement will be avoided." American Fabrics Co. v. Richmond Lace Works, supra.

not have occurred.[3] There can be no contributory infringement without an infringement to contribute to,[4] or, in other words, without actual,[5] direct,[6] and complete[7] infringement, existing or threatened,[8] in the territory covered by the patent.[9] One distinct act of direct infringement is not contributory to another distinct act of direct infringement.[10] While the making or selling of a part of a patented invention with the intent and purpose of aiding another in the unlawful making, selling, or using of the invention[11] is the mode in which contributory infringement usually takes place,[12] yet an act constituting contributory infringement may have no relation to furnishing an infringer with any article or material;[13] it may consist in actively assisting an infringer in the sale of an infringing device,[14] purchasing articles made by an infringing process where the articles are specially made for defendant on large and regular orders therefor,[15] inducing a person to use an infringing device,[16] or, inducing a licensee to violate the conditions of a license.[17] Furnishing plans of an infringing device and sharing in the profits is infringement,[18] but the mere letting of a contract, for the doing of certain work, to a firm using infringing apparatus is not.[19]

[§ 517] b. Manufacture or Sale—(1) In General. Contributory infringement may consist in assisting an infringer by active participation in the sale of an infringing device.[20] Also it may consist in selling a device, the natural use of which will make the purchaser an infringer;[21] but a charge of contributory infringement cannot be sustained because defendant's device, which, as made and sold, differs materially in form from that of the patent, may, as the result of wear and ordinary use, become identical.[22]

Licensor is a contributory infringer where, after granting a license to one person, he makes an agreement with another person whereby he purports to relieve the latter from liability to suit for the future acts of the latter in making and selling articles embodying the principle of the patent.[23]

Corporation and officers.[24] A corporation which controls another corporation which furnishes infringing apparatus may be guilty of contributory infringement.[25] An officer or stockholder of a corporation cannot be held liable as a contributory infringer merely because, after the infringement was completed and suit therefor was brought, he aided in disposing of the property of the infringing company.[26]

[§ 518] (2) Parts of Patented Invention. A person is guilty of contributory infringement when, without authority from the patentee, he manufactures, sells, or furnishes one or more parts or elements of a patented combination with the intent and for the purpose of bringing about the use thereof in such combination after another person, such as the purchaser or user, has supplied the other parts or elements, if any, and assembled all the parts into the complete combination;[27] and this is true not only

[b] Sale and use.—"While a manufacturer who sells, or his vendee who resells, may be guilty of a distinct act of infringement, neither thereby contributes, in a legal sense, to any future infringing acts of use. . . . A seller of an infringing device completes his act of infringement by selling; his relationship with the device is then ended. And if the mere succession which is found in relationship or in the tradition of the device from the one as manufacturer or seller to the other as user (or reseller) does not make them joint infringers, it is difficult to see upon what theory the seller, by merely devolving upon the user a portion of the device, can in any sense be regarded as a contributor to, or participator in, an infringing use." where he, by directions or advice, points out the way in which direct infringement may be accomplished,[28] but even where he gives formal notice that the component parts are not to be used in an infringing way.[29] The rule is undoubtedly applicable where the part furnished is adapted to no other than an infringing use,[30] it being presumed in such case that it is intended for such use;[31] but it is not necessarily applicable where the part furnished is adapted to other and lawful uses, in addition to infringing uses,[32] especially where it is a common article of commerce,[33] and in such case contributory infringement exists when, and only when, there is an intent to furnish for infringing use.[34] The rule has no application to a perishable element, article, or product;[35] and of course it does not apply where a person does not furnish any element of the patented combination.[36] It is not contributory infringement to make and sell parts to lawful owners, licensees, or users of patented machines or devices for legitimate purposes of repair,[37] or to make and ship parts abroad,[38] and there is no infringement if the parts are never put into actual use in the patented combination.[39]

Selling ingredients of patented composition with the expectation and intent that they be used in making it is contributory infringement.[40]

[§ 519] (3) Article Used with Patented Invention. Ordinarily the sale of an article not covered by the claims of a patent but capable of use with the patented invention is not infringement or contributory infringement,[41] at least where the seller of the article is without notice that the invention was sold under restrictions,[42] and even, it is held, where the seller has knowledge that the article is to be used with the patented invention.[43] The rule is especially applicable where the thing alleged to be contributed is one of general use, suitable to a great variety of other methods of use,[44] and there is no agreement or definite purpose that the thing sold shall be employed with other things so as to infringe a patent right.[45] A sale, however, with intent to induce a licensee under the patent to violate the valid terms of his license agreement is contributory infringement.[46] Also it is contributory infringement to sell articles which can be used only

[§ 520] B. Effect on Title.[51] A patent right in an invention does not give to the patentee title to a thing made in violation of the patent.[52]

[§ 521] C. Actions[53]—1. Right and Form of Action; Jurisdiction and Venue[54]—a. In General. It is essential to a cause of action for infringement of a patent that an act of infringement shall have been committed prior to the institution of the suit,[55] or, where an injunction is asked, that infringement shall at least be actually threatened or reasonably apprehended.[56] A suit for infringement cannot be based upon a violation of covenants of a license which have nothing to do with a trespass upon the rights granted by the patent,[57] but are rather the consideration for the license[58] and are governed by contract law, as distinguished from patent law;[59] infringement of a patent is a tort,[60] and an action for infringement is to be distinguished from an action based upon contract, express or implied.[61] As previously stated, the elements of infringement consist of the unauthorized[62] making, selling, or using[63] of an invention covered by a valid[64] patent during the life or term thereof;[65] and where any one of these elements is lacking, a suit for infringement fails.[66] The patent is the source of the right to maintain an action for infringement,[67] and the cause of action depends upon whether a patent has in fact been granted,[68] rather than upon a right to the issuance of a patent;[69] while there can be no infringement of an invalid patent,[70] and the suit fails where invalidity appears or is shown,[71] yet invalidity is a matter of defense.[72] It is said that a patentee cannot be compelled to enforce his remedy for infringement,[73] but, as hereinafter shown, an exclusive licensee may join the patentee with him as party complainant even against the will of the patentee.[74] A suit for infringement of a patent is in personam[75] and not in rem.[76]

Where surrendered patent has been reissued, the infringement of the reissue is a new cause of action[77] for which in general no remedy can be had except by a suit or action on the reissued patent.[78]

Jurisdiction of particular courts. Jurisdiction of suits for infringement of patents is vested in the federal courts,[79] irrespective of the sum or value of the matter in controversy,[80] and their jurisdiction is exclusive of that of state courts.[81] The particular federal courts vested with jurisdiction are the district courts,[82] the supreme court of the District of Columbia,[83] and, in the case of claims against the United States government, the court of claims.[84] Where plaintiff alleges a valid patent, sufficient title thereto, and infringement, and defendant denies validity and infringement, federal jurisdiction is complete, as involving a federal question,[85] and is not ousted by the fact that defendant interjects a dispute about the title.[86]

[§ 522] b. Actions at Law or in Equity—(1) In General. Generally speaking, either an action at law for damages[87] or an action in equity[88] for an injunction,[89] and, as incidental thereto, an accounting for profits[90] and damages,[91] may be brought for infringement of a patent. However, the distinction between jurisdiction at law and jurisdiction in equity observed in suits in federal courts generally[92] is applicable to suits for infringement of patents,[93] and the jurisdiction of a court of equity arises only where there are grounds for equitable interference[94] and not where the remedy at law would be full and complete.[95] If it is not clear that the remedy at law would be adequate, equity has jurisdiction.[96] Jurisdiction in equity is usually predicated upon the right to an injunction,[97] and a court of equity will not ordinarily take cognizance of a suit for infringement unless it involves injunctive relief,[98] but in exceptional cases there may be grounds for equitable relief other than an injunction,[99] as where the title of complainant is equitable merely,[1] or where equitable interposition is necessary on account of impediments which prevent a resort to remedies purely legal[2] or render the remedies in a legal tribunal difficult, inadequate, and incomplete.[3] The jurisdiction of a court of equity is to be determined according to conditions which exist at the time the bill is filed,[4] and not according to conditions which come into existence after commencement of the suit,[5] even though an injunction is prevented by subsequent conditions, such as the expiration of the patent pending the suit[6] or the cessation of infringement coupled with a promise not to renew it.[7] The right of action, if any, against an individual for infringement by the use of property owned by, and under the exclusive care and custody of, the United States is at law[8] and not in equity.[9] A like rule applies to a right of action against an officer of the United States for infringing acts performed under orders of the government.[10] However, where neither the United States nor any one of the officers is a party defendant, the fact that the suit is brought against an individual or private corporation that has contracted to do certain public work does not oust the court of its equitable jurisdiction to hear and decide the suit,[11] even though there may be sufficient reasons to induce the refusal of relief by injunction.[12]

Where patent has been assigned, the assignee may, as an incident to equitable relief, sue in equity for damages sustained after he became owner,[13] but, to recover damages suffered by the assignor, he should proceed at law.[14] The action is properly brought in equity where only a part interest has been assigned; the assignor is one of the complainants and has a right to an injunction and accounting.[15]

[§ 523] (2) Actions for Damages, Profits, or Accounting Alone—(a) In General. An action at law cannot be maintained for the sole purpose of recovering the profits which an infringer of a patent has made;[16] if only the recovery of damages is sought in an action for an infringement, the remedy at law is adequate,[17] and a court of equity has no jurisdiction;[18] an action for an account of profits and damages alone cannot be maintained in equity where there is no equitable ground of relief,[19] and ordinarily an account cannot be had except as an incident to an injunction;[20] but an account may be had where there is ground for equitable interference,[21] as where the case falls within one of the exceptions to the general rule that jurisdiction of a court of equity in infringement suits must ordinarily be limited to cases involving injunctive relief.[22]

[§ 524] (b) After, or Shortly Prior to, Expiration of Patent. Where suit is brought upon a patent which has expired, equity ordinarily has no jurisdiction,[23] as no injunction can be obtained[24] and the proper remedy is at law;[25] but it has jurisdiction where, by reason of his nonuse of the patented invention, plaintiff has not sustained any damages and a recovery in equity of the actual profits made by defendant is the only remedy,[26] and where expired and unexpired patents are joined, equity may take jurisdiction.[27] Unless a suit is begun so late that, under the rules or usual practice of the court, no injunction can be obtained before the expiration of the patent,[28] or no special ground for equitable interference is shown,[29] a court of equity may properly entertain jurisdiction of a suit for infringement of a patent which will expire in the near future,[30] and before the controversy can be finally determined;[31] and where jurisdiction is once acquired, it is not ousted by the expiration of the patent during the pendency of the suit,[32] but continues for the purpose of an accounting,[33] although such expiration is a ground for denying an injunction,[34] and the right to the injunction was the basis of equity jurisdiction.[35]

[§ 525] c. Joinder or Severance of Causes of Action; Multifariousness.[36] A bill joining infringement of a patent and slander is multifarious.[37] On the other hand, a bill is not multifarious where, in addition to equitable relief for infringement of a patent, it prays for a transfer of the patent,[38] the cancellation of an assignment,[39] or an injunction against the use of the name applied to the article by the patentee.[40] Also, a bill primarily for infringement is not rendered multifarious by setting out a contract between plaintiff and defendant binding defendant not to contest the validity of the patent;[41] an adjudication against an interfering patent and relief against infringement may be asked for in the same suit;[42] and causes of action for infringement of a patent and unfair competition may be joined where the same acts constitute both infringement and unfair competition,[43] and the necessary diversity of citizenship of the parties exists,[44] although not where diversity of citizenship is lacking,[45] or the two causes of action are entirely separate and distinct,[46] as where the respective acts upon which they are based are separate and their consequences are distinct.[47]

Suit upon several patents. A bill is not necessarily obnoxious to the charge of multifariousness because the suit is brought upon more than one patent;[48] a single suit may be brought for the infringement of several patents where the inventions covered by those patents are embodied in one infringing process, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter;[49] and where conjoint use is alleged, the bill is not multifarious;[50] but in the absence of conjoint use, a single suit cannot be maintained,[51] and, unless conjoint use by defendant is alleged, the bill is multifarious.[52] In England, where suit is brought on numerous patents, plaintiff may be required to limit the number.[53] Where patents for an invention and for an improvement thereon are owned by the same person, a cause of action for infringement is entire,[54] and two separate actions for the infringement of each patent cannot be maintained.[55]

Suit on separate claims of one patent. Suit may be maintained upon some of the claims of a patent and not others,[56] and it is not defeated by the invalidity of the others.[57]

Repeated infringements of a patent may be sued for in one action.[58] Indeed, complainant is not at liberty to bring separate and successive suits against the same defendant for separate acts of infringement committed before the institution of the first suit.[59]

Suit against several defendants.[60] A bill for infringement of a patent in a suit against two or more defendants may be multifarious,[61] as where it charges defendants with infringement severally;[62] but it is not multifarious where it sufficiently alleges joint infringement,[63] and it is said that, even if a cause of action against a corporation for infringement of a patent and one against its sole stockholder for infringement before he formed the corporation are separate, they may be united in one suit in order to promote the convenient administration of jus-

[§ 526] d. Place To Sue[65]—(1) In General. It is provided by a federal statute that, in suits brought for the infringement of patents, the district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction in the district of which defendant is an inhabitant, or in any district in which defendant, whether a person, partnership, or corporation, shall have committed acts of infringement and have a regular and established place of business.[66] While the statute does not relate to,[67] or take away,[68] the general jurisdiction of district courts over infringement suits,[69] but relates merely to venue[70] or the personal privilege of immunity from suit except in a particular district or districts,[71] and this privilege may be waived or lost by a general appearance and failure to object to jurisdiction before pleading to the merits,[72] or by otherwise consenting to or accepting the jurisdiction of the court of the district in which the suit is brought,[73] nevertheless the privilege of immunity is a matter of substantive law[74] and not a mere matter of practice.[75] Jurisdiction exists where the case is within either the first[76] or second[77] alternative of the statute; but where the right to object to the venue is not waived,[78] and defendant is not an inhabitant of the district in which the suit is brought, jurisdiction does not exist unless defendant has not only committed an act of infringement in the district,[79] but also has a regular and established place of business therein[80] at the time the suit is brought.[81] The suit must be commenced by plaintiff in a proper district, regardless of convenience[82] or fear of imminent infringement;[83] and inquiry into the question of jurisdiction should be made at the outset of the litigation,[84] it being better, where it is extremely doubtful whether jurisdiction exists, to remit the parties to the district where there is no doubt as to jurisdiction, before, rather than after,

65. Pendency of suit in one district as ground of abatement of suit in another district see Abatement and Revival § 120.

66. Judicial Code § 48.

[a] Enlargement or restriction of jurisdiction.—(1) The statute restricts jurisdiction in the sense that it does not permit suit to be brought in any district wherein defendant may be served (Bowers v. Atlantic, etc., Co., 104 Fed. 887), (2) and it enlarges jurisdiction in the sense that, in a case within its second alternative, it permits suit to be brought in a district in which neither plaintiff nor defendant resides (Cutler-Hammer Mfg. Co. v. Curtis, 296 Fed. 117).

[b] Jurisdiction in pending cases was not ousted by the statute. Westinghouse Air-Brake Co. v. Great Northern R. Co., 88 Fed. 258, 31 CCA 525.

[c] Prior to passage of statute (1) a suit for infringement could be brought in any district where valid service could be had. Bowers v. Atlantic, etc., Co., 104 Fed. 887; Westinghouse Air-Brake Co. v. Great Northern R. Co., 88 Fed. 258, 31 CCA 525. (2) The provision of the Judiciary Act of 1888 (25 St. at L. 434 c 866), that no civil suit should be brought in any circuit court against any person by original process in any district other than that whereof he is an inhabitant, did not apply to patent infringement suits. [b] Use by resident of district.—The law gives to the owner of a patent the right to sue the user of an infringing device in the district where both parties reside, and he may, without incurring the displeasure or reprobation of the court, exercise this right instead of going far from home and suing the manufacturer in the district where the infringing device was made. Ryder v. Townsend, 188 Fed. 792.

[c] Regardless of place of infringement (1) the court has jurisdiction of defendant where he is an inhabitant of the district wherein suit is brought. Westinghouse Electric, etc., Co. v. Stanley Electric Mfg. Co., 116 Fed. 641. (2) A resident of the district may be enjoined from selling anywhere. Hatch v. Hall, 22 Fed. 438; Boyd v. McAlpin, 3 F. Cas. [a] Facts not constituting waiver.—(1) A foreign corporation which did no business and committed no act of infringement in the district wherein it was sued did not waive its right to object to the venue by obtaining authority to do business in the state and naming a place of business in the state, as well as an agent upon whom service of process could there be had. Heine Chimney Co. v. Rust Engineering Co., 12 F. (2d) 596. [a] Duties of court and parties.—(1) It is incumbent upon plaintiff to aver (see infra § 557) (2) and prove (see infra § 573) (3) the requisite jurisdictional facts; it is the duty of defendant to bring the question of jurisdiction to the court's attention (Colgate v. Procter, etc., Mfg. Co., 25 F. (2d) 160); (4) and it is the duty of the court, at the outset of the litigation, and even on its own initiative, to inquire into its own expensive and protracted litigation has been had.[85] In determining the question of jurisdiction, the court will not inquire into the merits of the suit[86] further than to determine, where jurisdiction depends upon the commission of acts of infringement within the district,[87] whether the acts committed in the district prima facie constitute,[88] or are bona fide claimed to be,[89] infringement.

. Alien may be sued in the district in which he has a regular and established place of business and has committed an act of infringement,[90] or in any district in which process can be served upon him.[91]

In Canada suit must be brought in the court nearest defendant's residence.[92]

[§ 527] (2) Meaning of Statutory Terms. "Act of infringement," within the meaning of the statute and the foregoing rules,[93] consists in the making,[94] use,[95] or sale[96] of the patented invention. Ordinarily a completed act of infringement in the district is essential;[97] but acts committed in the district and constituting contributory infringement are acts of infringement within the meaning of the statute,[98] even though the infringement is completed by acts committed by another person in another jurisdiction.[99] Contracts to manufacture[1] or negotiations for a sale[2] are not sufficient. Also, a mere threat[3] or intention[4] to infringe is not sufficient, although in a case of a threatened infringement plaintiff is not without remedy,[5] as he may sue in the district in which defendant is an inhabitant.[6]

"Regular and established place of business," within the meaning of the statute and the foregoing rules,[7] is a place where the same business in kind, if not in degree, as that done at the home office or principal place of business of defendant, is carried on.[8] While the doing of business in the district is essential,[9] it alone is not sufficient;[10] the business must be done at a regular[11] and established[12] place.

[§ 528] (3) Two or More Suits or Defendants; Counterclaim. Suit against two or more defendants may be brought in a particular district where each defendant is either an inhabitant of the district or has committed an act of infringement, and has a reg-jurisdiction (Colgate v. Procter, etc., Mfg. Co., supra).

Chicago Pneumatic Tool Co. v. Philadelphia Pneumatic Tool Co., 118 Fed. 852. (2) On the other hand there is no act of infringement in the district where orders are merely solicited or taken in the district and they are subject to acceptance or rejection, and the sales, if any, are consummated, in another district. W. S. Tyler Co. v. Ludlow-Saylor Wire Co., 236 U. S. 723, 35 SCt 458, 59 L. ed. 808 [aff 212 Fed. 156, 129 CCA 12]; Cutler-Hammer Mfg. Co. v. Curtis, 296 Fed. 117; Stryker Deflector Co. v. 12. American Electric Welding Co. v. Lalance, etc., Mfg. Co., 256 Fed. 34.

[a] Mere "place of business" distinguished.—"Passing for the moment to consider the proper construction of the phrase 'established place of business,' the words themselves necessarily indicate that an 'established' place of business is more ularly established place of business therein,[13] or where one defendant is an inhabitant of the district and the other defendants are inhabitants of other districts in the same state,[14] but not where one defendant is an inhabitant of another state, has committed no act of infringement, and has no regular and established place of business in the district, and does not consent to jurisdiction.[15]

Counterclaim for infringement of a patent is within the application of the statute,[16] notwithstanding a rule of court relating to counterclaims in equitable suits,[17] and jurisdiction of the person of plaintiff in respect of the counterclaim does not exist unless he is within the requirements of the statute[18] or, by waiver of objections or otherwise, consents to jurisdiction.[19]

Second suit against same defendant. A suit for a new infringement committed by the same defendant after the termination of the prior suit need not be brought in the same district as the former suit where jurisdiction can be obtained only by consent,[20] but may be brought in any district wherein the jurisdictional facts exist.[21]

Reissued patent. Subject to such restrictions as are imposed by statute,[22] the owner of a reissued patent has the legal right to decide where he will bring suit for infringement thereof,[23] without interference from a person who was defendant in a former suit for infringement of the original patent.[24]

[§ 529] 2. Conditions Precedent. By virtue of a federal statute, and the construction placed thereon, it is essential to the recovery of damages, although not to the issuance of an injunction, in a suit for infringement of a patent, that plaintiff shall have given notice, either to the whole public by marking his article "patented," or to the particular defendants by informing them of his patent and their infringement thereof; and where direct notice to defendants is relied upon damages, profits, and an accounting, are limited to acts of infringement committed after the giving of the notice.[25]

[§ 530] 3. Time To Sue—a. In General. An inventor cannot sue for infringement until after a patent has issued for his invention;[26] but after a patent has issued to him, he is not obliged to defer the bringing of suit until after the termination of proceedings on an interference declared between his patent and pending applications;[27] and after the owner of a patent has obtained an interlocutory decree adjudging its validity and infringement, he is not required to wait until it has become final before bringing suit for infringement by the same device in another district.[28]

[§ 531] b. Limitations.[29] By express provision of a federal statute no damages or profits can be recovered for acts of infringement occurring more than six years before suit is brought;[30] and the statute applies to actions at law[31] as well as to suits in equity.[32] In all cases where a federal statute of limitation exists, state statutes of limitation can have no application;[33] but prior to 1870,[34] and from 1874 to 1897,[35] no federal statutes existed limiting the time within which actions for infringement of patents must be brought, and the question frequently arose whether actions at law were subject to state statutes of limitation, it being held in some cases that they were[36] and in others that they were than, or at the very least different from, merely a 'place of business.' Otherwise Congress used a meaningless word, an act, with a result, which surely could not have been intended and should not be inferred, unless no other construction be possible. It is, however, entirely clear that the word was selected deliberately, to signify that the particular place of business contemplated was not any place where business might be transacted, however temporarily, but must be a permanent place of business." [§ 532] c. Laches—(1) In General. A suit for infringement of a patent,[39] or at least particular relief therein,[40] may be barred by laches, as where there has been long delay in bringing suit[41] without a valid and sufficient excuse therefor,[42] or unreasonable delay,[43] or delay accompanied by circumstances amounting to an estoppel.[44] The question of laches depends upon whether, under all the circumstances, plaintiff is chargeable with lack of due diligence,[45] and it would be inexequitable to permit the enforcement of his claim;[46] and the facts and circumstances in a particular case may not be such as to constitute laches barring the suit.[47] Also, laches is not merely a question of lapse of time;[48] and mere delay in bringing suit, unaccompanied by such deceitful acts or silence on the part of the patentee, and by such circumstances, as amount to an equitable estoppel, will not warrant the application of the doctrine of laches,[49] at least where the suit is com-

Starrett v. J. Stevens Arms, etc., Co., 96 Fed. 244 [aff 100 Fed. 93, 40 CCA 289]. (3) Also, where plaintiff, the owner of a patent relating to concrete arches in bridges and buildings, has for years since the issuance of the patent been in close touch with concrete construction throughout the United States, and during that time bridges and other structures coming as near infringing the patent as the structure in controversy have been erected by individuals and municipalities without the assertion of any right by plaintiff, he is estopped by laches from asserting such a construction of his patent as would bring the structure in controversy within its meaning. [a] "There are peculiar and special reasons why the holder of a patent should not be barred from enforcing his right under the patent because of his failure to promptly sue infringers. Frequently the position of the patentee (financial and otherwise) prevents the institution of suits. The patent litigation is often prolonged and expensive. Moreover from the very nature of the thing he cannot be fully cognizant of all infringements that occur throughout the length and breadth of this country. His information may be largely hearsay. Then, also, the validity of his patent and the infringement thereof may be, as here, disputed. These defenses present mixed questions of fact and law concerning which there is necessarily some doubt and uncertainty. . . . In a doubtful case the commercial success of the patented art is at times determinative of the issue of validity. This factor cannot be shown save as time establishes it. Moreover, common experience proves that inventions which appear to be revolutionary are often not accepted by the public and never become a commercial success. A patentee is therefore justified in waiting to ascertain whether realizations equal expectations." George J. Meyer Mfg. Co. v. Miller Mfg. Co., 24 F. (2d) 505, 507.

"Delay and silence within the life of a patent, unaccompanied by such acts or silence of the owner as amount to inducing deceit and thereby to an equitable estoppel . . . will not deprive such owner of his right to recover for an infringement of the exclusive rights secured to him by the patent." Drum v. Turner, 219 Fed. 188, 198, 135 CCA 74 [certiorari mence within the statutory period of limitation,[50] it being only under very special circumstances that complainant will be held chargeable with laches where he sues within such period.[51]

Dismissal or discontinuance of prior suit against the same defendant[52] and a slight delay in commencing the subsequent suit[53] do not necessarily constitute laches barring the second suit; but a long delay in instituting the second suit constitutes laches barring it where defendant protested against the dismissal of the suit, threatened to infringe, and subsequently expended a large sum in new plants and machinery.[54] No laches or estoppel on the part of plaintiff exists where the suit dismissed was against one of defendant's customers, and defendant changed the design of the machine manufactured by him with the avowed purpose of avoiding infringement of plaintiff's patent.[55]

Affirmative relief asked by each party. The general rule that, where each of the parties seeks affirmative relief against the other in reference to the same transaction, neither may assert that the other was guilty of laches[56] does not, of course, apply in a suit for infringement of a patent where the facts do not bring the case within it.[57]

[§ 533] (2) As Bar to Particular Relief or Recovery—(a) Injunction—aa. In General. Courts of equity refuse to grant relief by way of injunction against infringement where complainant has long delayed to seek relief under circumstances indicating acquiescence in the infringement,[58] or where he has not shown good faith, conscience, activity, and diligence.[59] However, delay and acquiescence sufficient to prove a preliminary injunction[60] may not be sufficient to deprive complainant of all relief in a court of equity[61] or prevent the court, on final hearing, from granting such relief as may be just and equitable,[62] as, for instance, a final injunction against future infringement;[63] and, likewise, delay which, in equity, prevents a recovery of, or accounting for, profits and damages for past infringements[64] does not necessarily prevent a court of equity from enjoining future infringements.[65]

[§ 534] bb. Preliminary Injunction. Ordinarily, a preliminary injunction will not be granted in a suit for infringement of a patent[66] where there has been laches on the part of plaintiff,[67] as where he delayed bringing suit, or applying for an injunction, for a considerable period of time after acquiring knowledge of infringement,[68] during that period he acquiesced in, or did not object to, the infringement,[69] and he does not satisfactorily explain the acquiescence;[70] but where it seems apparent that an injunction at the final hearing is inevitable, an injunction pendente lite will be granted, notwithstanding laches of complainant in asserting his rights;[71] and the right to a preliminary injunction is not barred or affected by delay where the delay is slight and defendant has not been induced to change his posi-

[a] Thus (1) mere delay in bringing suit for infringement of a patent will not prevent the owner thereof from obtaining relief in a court of equity when the infringement has been persisted in with knowledge of the patent, and there have been no acts of commission or omission on the part of the patentee to encourage its use. Wilcox, etc., Co. v. Farrand Organ Co., 139 Fed. 46. (2) Complainant's failure to sue for infringement of its patents for some years after it was begun does not amount to laches, barring recovery, where an officer of complainant notified defendant it was infringing and threatened suit, and defendant made no outlay and did not change its position on the faith of any act of complainant. U. S. Slicing Mach. Co. v. Wolf, Sayer & Heller, Inc., 249 Fed. 245 [aff 261 Fed. 195]. (3) Where defendant, or the former owner of his business, ceased for a time to manufacture the infringing machine or device (Todd Protectograph Co. v. Safe-Guard Check Writer Co., 291 Fed. 613), (4) or promised to cease manufacturing (Rajah Auto Supply Co. v. Belvidere Screw, etc., Co., 275 Fed. 761), (5) plaintiff is not barred by either laches or estoppel from maintaining the suit.

tion,[72] or defendant has had notice or knowledge, during the entire period of delay, of the patent and the rights or claims thereunder.[73]

[§ 535] (b) Damages and Profits. Generally speaking, a recovery of, or accounting for, profits and damages for past infringements may be barred in equity by laches,[74] not only where there has been acquiescence and inexcusable laches,[75] but also where there has been mere delay in seeking relief;[76] and not only where there was actual knowledge of infringement during a long period of delay,[77] but also where, during a long period of time, the alleged infringing acts were committed openly and under such circumstances that the facts could have been ascertained by reasonable effort.[78] However, in some cases a recovery of, or accounting for, profits and damages has been allowed notwithstanding delay in the commencement of the suit,[79] as where there was a sufficient excuse for the delay[80] or defendant commenced and developed an infringing business after the validity of the patent had been adjudicated;[81] and a recovery of damages occurring after the commencement of the suit has been allowed where there was laches but no estoppel.[82]

[§ 536] (3) Excuses for Delay. Delay in suing an infringer may be excused on the ground that the infringing article, as at first constructed by defendant, was believed by complainant not to be commercially harmful, and the grounds for such belief were reasonable.[83] Also, laches is not to be imputed to a patent owner because of his failure to prosecute to judgment a suit against an infringer after the latter has become totally insolvent;[84] and plaintiff's poverty or lack of financial means to carry on litigation may be considered in connection with other matters as tending to excuse delay,[85] but it alone is not a sufficient excuse.[86] It is no excuse for delay that plaintiff's coöwners of the patent would not agree to prosecute infringers.[87]

Ignorance of infringement. Long acquiescence and laches on the part of a patentee may be excused by satisfactory proof that he had no knowledge or means of knowledge that his patent was being infringed,[88] or that his suspicions of infringement were allayed by the direct misrepresentations of defendant;[89] but a patentee cannot stand by with "easy indifference" when there are facts sufficient to put him on notice, and then plead ignorance as an excuse for his laches.[90]

Pendency of other infringement suits. Delay in the institution or prosecution of a suit for infringement of a patent is excused by the institution, pendency, and prosecution of another suit for infringement of the same patent;[91] and this is true regardless of whether the other suit is between the same parties and directed against the same product,[92] or is against another alleged infringer and involves the validity of the patent[93] or substantially the same

[b] Several years.—A delay of several years, after knowledge of defendant's infringement, will not affect the right to a preliminary injunction, where his proceedings have been the subject of dispute and negotiation during the whole period. National Heeling-Mach. Co. v. Abbott, 77 Fed. 462.

issue as that involved in the present suit.[94]

[§ 537] (4) Laches of Prior Owner. The acquiescence, if any, of a former owner of a patent in an alleged infringement thereof, or his laches or negligence, if any, in failing to seek relief for a considerable time after knowledge of an infringement, is chargeable against a subsequent assignee or purchaser,[95] and has the same effect in equity upon the latter's rights as his own acquiescence, laches, or negligence;[96] but, as in other cases,[97] a suit is not barred by mere delay unaccompanied by any act amounting to an estoppel.[98]

[§ 538] 4. Defenses[99]—a. In General. Invalidity of the patent is a complete defense in a suit brought for infringement thereof.[1] Indeed, invalidity and noninfringement are the defenses usually interposed in suits for infringement of patents.[2] Defendant may show that plaintiff is not the owner of the patent;[3] but a technical defense as to legal ownership by complainant is not favored;[4] where plaintiff traces his title back to the patentee by assignments acknowledged before notaries public, and defendant is a stranger to the assignments, he cannot question plaintiff's title;[5] and where the patentee is defendant in a suit for infringement brought by the assignee and legal owner of the patent, he cannot defend on the ground that he was induced to part with the title to the patent by unfair representations.[6]

License granted by the patentee or owner of the patent is a complete and perfect defense to an action for infringement,[7] except where the conditions of the license have been violated,[8] in which case lack of uniformity in enforcing the conditions is not a defense.[9]

Coming into court with unclean hands. A patentee who uses the name of a court, in advance of adjudication, to harass or obstruct a rival comes into court with unclean hands,[10] and on that ground alone will be denied relief to which he otherwise might be entitled.[11] However, the maxim, He who comes into equity must come with clean hands,[12] is not rendered applicable by the fact that the bill makes erroneous statements as to an immaterial matter[13] or that plaintiff makes misleading statements to procure a preliminary injunction, where the true state of facts is called to the attention of the court with sufficient promptness to prevent any inadvertent or summary action by it;[14] and the fact that plaintiff has wrongfully canceled, or committed a breach of, a contract with defendant which would have expired by its terms long before the commencement of the suit is not so directly connected with plaintiff's right which he is seeking to protect and enforce in the suit as to render the maxim applicable.[15]

10. Gerosa v. Apco Mfg. Co., 299

Various matters held not to constitute defenses in a suit for infringement of a patent include: The fact that the patented invention has never been manufactured or put into commercial use by the owner of the patent;[16] inability of the manufacturer of a patented device to supply the demand therefor with promptness;[17] manufacture, use, or sale by defendant under, or in accordance with, another patent subsequent to the one in suit;[18] use of the invention only in connection with a gambling device;[19] the fact that defendant has been trespassing upon the rights of the owner of the patent for years with impunity;[20] ignorance of chemical reactions;[21] misnomer of an invention clearly described and claimed in the patent;[22] fraud on patent officials,[23] or fraud,[24] collusion,[25] or illegal procedure[26] in a statutory suit to compel issuance of the patent; membership of plaintiff in an illegal combination in restraint of trade;[27] a collateral agreement between the assignor and assignee of the patent that the former will not engage in the manufacture and sale of competing articles during the term of the patent;[28] the fact that a city, in soliciting bids for paving, specified a patented pavement;[29] and the circumstance that another person pays the cost of infringement.[30] A contract by defendant to manufacture the infringing device for the United States government is not a defense;[31] and whatever rights and equities the government may have as against its employee who has patented an invention are not available to, and do not constitute a defense in favor of, a third person sued for infringement.[32] In a suit for infringement of a combination patent, it is no defense that the various elements of the combination may be found in the prior art.[33] One entering the field with an infringing device at a time when the validity and scope of the patent are unquestioned and the patented article has an extensive market does not acquire any intervening rights relieving him from liability for infringing a reissue of the patent.[34]

Star Ball Player Co. v. Baseball Display Co., supra.

[a] Prior patents.—"The charge of infringement may not be averted by showing that in one patent some of the elements of the patent alleged to be infringed are used, and in another others, but it must be made to appear that all of the elements of the combination alleged to be infringed are united in one combination for which a prior patent has been issued." [§ 539] b. Estoppel.[35] The general principles of estoppel apply in suits for infringement,[36] unless the facts are not such as to render the principles applicable.[37] The language of plaintiff's advertising literature will not be given a strained construction in order to make it operate as an estoppel against plaintiff.[38] An agreement by two firms manufacturing under patents relating to the same subject matter, that neither will interfere with the other in the manufacture of the inventions set forth in their respective patents, and that each will protect the other against third parties, operates to disqualify one party from acquiring any right to prosecute the other for any alleged infringement arising from operating under the patents of the latter.[39]

[§ 540] 5. Persons Entitled To Sue and Parties Plaintiff—a. In General. Generally speaking, a suit for infringement of a patent must be brought in the name of the owner of the patent,[40] and the legal owner is a necessary party complainant;[41] but an equitable title to a patent will support a suit for infringement against the holder of the legal title.[42] Until he has parted with his legal title to the patent, the patentee may sue.[43] Also, suit may be brought by an executor or administrator[44] or by a person who holds the legal title of the patent in trust,[45] although not by an attorney in fact,[46] a selling agent,[47] or a receiver appointed to take charge of, manage, and control the patent, but not vested with title thereto.[48]

Damages. A federal statute provides that damages for the infringement of a patent may be recovered by an action brought in the name of the party interested, either as patentee, assignee, or grantee.[49] The person "interested," within the meaning of the statute, is the person who was in-

[a] Specific applications of rules.—(1) Where a patentee, during the course of proceedings to obtain the patent, practically conceded priority of a specific process for making the same articles, his successor in title is estopped thereafter to assert infringement by articles made in accordance with the process. Goodwin Film, etc., Co. v. Eastman Kodak Co., 207 Fed. 351 [aff 213 Fed. 231, 129 CCA 575]. (2) One who fails to perform his agreement to assign a patent cannot sue his proposed assignee for infringement. Schmitt v. Nelson Valve Co., 125 Fed. 754, 60 CCA 522. (3) Admissions in open court are binding. Kirchberger v. American Acetylene Burner Co., 124 Fed. 764 [aff 128 Fed. 599, 64 CCA 107]. (4) An agreement of settlement between the parties will be given effect as to all matters covered thereby. Greenwald v. Weist, 193 Fed. 79.

37. See cases infra this note.

[a] Matters held not to estop plaintiff.—(1) Where, before issuance of a patent, a government employee applying therefor amended his application so as to eliminate a dedication to the public, there is no estoppel on the part of his assignee as against an alleged infringer who did not have any knowledge of the original application until after the amendment and the issuance of the patent. Hazeltine Corp. v. Electric Serv., etc., Corp., 18 F. (2d) 662. (2) The sale by a partner to his copartner of his interest in the firm, without warranty, does not estop him, on subsequently acquiring a patent covering articles of the kind manufactured by the firm, to maintain a suit against his former partner for infringement not committed during the partnership term. Dull v. Reynolds Electric Flasher Mfg. Co., 161 Fed. 129. (3) The holder of a reissue is not estopped to sue one who used the invention prior to reissue. Crown Cork, etc., Co. v. Aluminum Stopper Co., 108 Fed. 845, 48 CCA 72 [rev 100 Fed. 849]. (4) Nonuse or misuse of the invention by complainant does not operate as estoppel. Fuller v Berger, 120 Fed. 274, 56 CCA 588 [certiorari den 193 U. S. 668 mem, 24 SCt 852 mem, 48 L. ed. 839 mem]. (5) Plaintiff is not estopped from asserting infringement, on the ground that another person in whose later patent defendant had an interest was the commercial pioneer, and introduced his apparatus with success during a period in which plaintiff was inactive. Weber Electric Co. v. Cutler-Hammer Mfg. Co., 256 Fed. 31, 167 CCA 303.

[b] Matters held not to estop defendant.—(1) Filing an application for patent for the same thing does not estop defendant. Haughey v. Lee, 151 U. S. 282, 14 SCt 331, 38 L. ed. 162; R. Thomas, etc., Co. v. Electric Porcelain, etc., Co., 111 Fed. 923. (2) An agreement between complainant and defendant which, as between them, establishes the validity of complainant's patent and defendant's prior infringement, does not estop defendant to show that articles made by him after the date of the agreement, and differing from those made before, do not infringe the patent. Smith v. Southington Mfg. Co., 235 Fed. 160 [rev on other grounds 247 Fed. 342, 159 CCA 436]; American Specialty Stamping Co. v. New England Enameling Co., 178 Fed. 106. (3) The president of defendant corporation, who had, prior to its organization, built and sold infringing machines, which had not been paid for, and the accounts for which had been transferred to defendant, on behalf of defendant wrote a letter to the purchaser, in which he acknowledged the sale of the machines by defendant, and guaranteed in its behalf that they were not infringements. It was held that, while the letter would, as between defendant and the purchaser, estop defendant from denying the truth thereof, it did not estop defendant as against complainant from showing that it did not in fact build or sell the machines. Palmer v. Jordan Mach. Co., 186 Fed. 496 [rev on other grounds 192 Fed. 42, 112 CCA 454].

[a] Purpose of rule.—The owner of the patent must be a party plaintiff not only to confer jurisdiction of the suit under the patent laws, but also in most cases to enable the alleged infringer to respond in one action to all claims of infringement for his act, and thus either to defeat all claims in one action or, by satisfying one adverse decree, to bar all subsequent actions. Independent Wireless Tel. Co. v. Radio Corp. of America, 269 U. S. 459, 46 SCt 166, 70 L. ed. 357 [aff 297 Fed. 521 (rev 297 Fed. 518, and reh den 270 U. S. 84, 46 SCt 224, 70 L. ed. 481)].

terested in the patent, and owned the exclusive right conferred thereby, when the infringement was committed;[50] it is a rule, both at law and in equity, that damages for past infringement may be sued for only by the person who was the owner of the patent at the time of the infringement,[51] and the sole[52] exception to the rule exists where the owner has assigned the patent and the claim for past infringement to the same person.[53]

Joinder. One of two or more joint owners of a patent cannot maintain a suit in equity to enjoin infringement without uniting the other joint owners.[54] All legal owners must join in a suit for infringement,[55] and where the suit is in equity, there should be a joinder of legal and equitable owners.[56] However, heirs need not join the administrator;[57] a mortgagor may sue without joining the mortgagee,[58] although the mortgagee is properly joined;[59] and a person who, under an agreement with complainant, was to receive a share of any amount which might be recovered, but who has filed a waiver or disclaimer of all interest in any decree which may be rendered and in any sum which may be paid by defendant pursuant to the decree, is not a necessary party complainant.[60] While only those having an interest in the patent should be joined as plaintiffs,[61] the suit should not be dismissed for misjoinder,[62] but instead an amendment should be permitted[63] or a party dismissed from the suit.[64]

[§ 541] b. After Making of Assignment.[65] A suit for infringement of a patent may be brought by an assignee[66] in his own name alone where the suit is for infringement occurring after the assignment[67] and the assignment is of the whole interest in, and exclusive right conferred by, the patent,[68] or is of the exclusive right under the patent within and throughout a specified part of the United States;[69] and suit may and must be brought in the joint names of the assignee and the patentee or other assignor where the assignment is of an undivided part of the entire interest;[70] but where a purported assignment does not fall within any of the foregoing classes, it confers upon the so-called assignee no right to sue[71] at law,[72] and no right to sue alone in equity,[73] as it is, at most, a mere license,[74] and a licensee cannot so sue.[75] Where the assignment in question was not made until after the commencement of the action, the right of the assignee to the relief sought is clearly no better or greater than the rights of his predecessors in title.[76]

Conditions in assignment do not necessarily take away the right of the assignee to sue alone.[77]

73. De Forest v. Collins Wireless Tel. Co., 174 Fed. 821.

[a] Reservation of right to sue.—A transfer of the patent does not authorize the transferee to sue for an injunction and accounting where the assignor receives back, or perhaps in legal effect reserves, the right to decide whom he will sue as an infringer and to keep for himself all he may recover. Jockmus v. London, 265 Fed. 12.

[b] Purported assignment of right to sue for damages and royalties, past or future, for the infringement of a patent does not authorize a suit by injunction to restrain infringers. De Forest v. Collins Wireless Tel. Co., 174 Fed. 821.

74. Licenses generally see supra §§ 408–482.

Damages for infringement proper to assignment may be recovered in an action brought in the name of the assignee alone where he is the assignee of both the patent and the claim for damages,[78] but not where he is the assignee of the patent[79] or of the claim for damages[80] alone.

Patentee or other former owner cannot sue for infringement occurring after the making of an absolute assignment of the patent,[81] or at least he cannot sue without making the assignee a party;[82] but the patentee has a sufficient interest in the patent to enable him to commence a suit for infringement where, notwithstanding an assignment to a trustee, he has a beneficial interest in the patent and its proceeds;[83] and where the patent alone is assigned, the patentee or other owner making the assignment may recover damages for prior infringement.[84]

[§ 542] c. After Granting of License[85]—(1) In General. Except where the patentee or other owner of the patent is the infringer,[86] or a contributory infringer,[87] or is otherwise hostile and is properly joined with the infringer as defendant,[88] a licensee of a patent cannot bring a suit in his own name alone, either at law or in equity, for its infringement.[89] A simple licensee has no such interest as to make him either a necessary[90] or a proper[91] party to the infringement suit; and a licensee whose license is not such as to amount to an assignment of the patent is not a necessary party complainant in such a suit,[92] although, if his interests are to be affected by the decree, he is a proper party,[93] and the court, in its discretion, may require him to be joined as a party plaintiff,[94] where objection is seasonably made by defendant.[95] Damages suffered by a nonexclusive licensee cannot be recovered in a suit brought and prosecuted by the owner of the patent for himself alone and not for the benefit of the licensee.[96] A part owner of certain patents, who has not granted any license, and a person holding a license from the other part owners, which also includes other patents in which their coöwner has no interest, have not such a unity of interest as entitles them to join in a bill for infringement of all of such patents.[97]

[a] At law or in equity.—"If the owner of the patent when the infringements took place has assigned his patent to one, and his claims for damages for infringement to another, then the latter can not sue at law at all but must compel his assignor of the claims to sue for him. In equity both such assignor and the assignee who is the real party in interest must join as plaintiffs. Such assignor is a necessary party and a bill for accounting and damages is fatally defective otherwise." Crown Die, etc., Co. v. Nye Tool, etc., Works, 261 U. S. 24, 44, 43 SCt 254, 67 L. ed. 516.

[§ 543] (2) Exclusive License. Where an exclusive license has been granted, an action at law for the benefit of the exclusive licensee may and must be brought in the name of the patentee alone.[98] Both the owner of the patent[99] and the exclusive licensee[1] are necessary parties to a suit in equity; but the licensee may sue alone where the owner of the patent is properly made a party defendant,[2] or the owner of the patent and the exclusive licensee may sue together;[3] and an exclusive licensee may join the owner of the patent with him as party complainant even against his will[4] where the owner is out of the jurisdiction[5] and refuses, upon request, to become a coplaintiff voluntarily,[6] although not where the owner of the patent may and should be made a party defendant,[7] or the circumstances are such that the court will protect him from being brought in as plaintiff against his will.[8]

whatever damages plaintiff may be able to show is joint[15] and several;[16] and, likewise, in equity all persons participating in the infringement of a patent are jointly[17] and severally[18] liable, or at least an injunction may issue against all,[19] but the profits recoverable from each are limited to those which he himself has made.[20] Where one defendant manufactured infringing articles, some of which were bought by his codefendants, conducting an independent business, and resold at the latter's own price, neither defendant is liable for the infringement by the other.[21]

Principal. In accordance with the general rule as to the liability of a principal for the torts of his agent,[22] a principal may be liable for an infringement committed by his agent.[23] Where a contractor is employed to do certain work and in doing it infringes a patent, the contractor and not the employer is liable.[24]

Personal representative.[25] An action for the infringement of a patent may, after the death of the infringer, be brought against his personal representative.[26]

Mere purchaser of infringing articles is not liable in an action at law as an infringer;[27] but, unless it is vexatious or oppressive,[28] a suit in equity may be instituted against a customer of a manufacturer,[29] notwithstanding the prior institution of another suit against the manufacturer.[30]

Part owner of patent is not liable to another part owner for infringement,[31] or at least he is not liable in equity,[32] but it has been held that he is liable at law where he has used or sold the patented invention without the authority of the coöwner.[33]

[§ 545] (2) Agents and Servants.[34] Generally speaking, both agents and servants are liable for infringements committed by them.[35] More specifically, servants and agents who make use of or sell for another a patented article are liable in an action at law to the patentee for damages sustained by him;[36] and one who as agent for another person sells an article which is an infringement of a patent may be restrained by injunction,[37] even where he has no pecuniary interest in the sale;[38] but such an agent is not liable to be compelled to account to the patentee for the profits of the sale of the infringing article,[39] unless it appears that he was pecuniarily interested in the sale;[40] and the use by one as the agent of another person of a patented device does not render him liable to account for infringement of the patent,[41] although a workman who uses an infringing article which is his own property is liable to be compelled to account to the patentee.[42]

Connected Therewith. Where a private corporation infringes a patent, it is liable therefor,[43] and it is not relieved from liability by transferring a part of its business to its managing officer;[44] nor is the issuance of a preliminary injunction against it precluded by the fact that it has gone out of active business, where it continues in existence for the purpose of collecting assets and discharging liabilities.[45] It is liable at law for damages,[46] or in equity for profits,[47] resulting from the infringement of a patent by one of its agents while proceeding within the scope of his powers; but it is not liable for the sale of an infringing machine by an individual before the incorporation of the company,[48] even though the individual subsequently became an officer and stockholder of the company[49] and the corporation took over the account, rendered bills, and collected the pay.[50] Where a private corporation, as a principal, coöperates with another corporation in the infringement of a patent, it is directly responsible to the patentee in an action at law for the resulting damage;[51] and one corporation is liable for the infringing acts of another corporation where it absolutely controls the latter,[52] or where it has purchased the assets and assumed the liabilities of the latter;[53] but a community of officers, directors, and stockholders does not alone make one corporation liable for the infringing acts of the other,[54] and, notwithstanding a close relationship between two corporations, one may not be liable for the infringing acts of the other where the latter is not the agent[55] or alter ego[56] of the former.

Stockholder of a corporation which has infringed a patent is not personally liable for infringement,[57] unless he has committed individual acts of infringement,[58] or unless he holds practically all of the stock of the corporation and personally controls and directs its action.[59]

Officers or directors.[60] Ordinarily an officer or director of the corporation is not, by virtue of his official capacity, individually or personally liable for infringement of the patent by the corporation,[61] or at least is not liable for damages[62] or profits,[63] where he has not acted beyond the scope of his office,[64] and it does not appear that the corporation is insolvent,[65] or that there is any other obstacle in the way of obtaining full relief against the corporation;[66] and a director may not be liable merely because he signed a certain paper or contract;[67] but one who in his capacity as officer of a private corporation actively participates in an infringement of a patent by it may be restrained by injunction;[68] in some cases an officer may be personally liable with the corporation,[69] as where, acting otherwise than as an officer, he willfully, knowingly, and personally participates in the manufacture and sale of an infringing article,[70] or uses the corporation as an instrument to carry out his own willful and deliberate infringements[71] and for the purpose of avoiding personal liability;[72] and, according to some authorities, a director who, by vote or otherwise, specifically commands a subordinate to engage in the manufacture and sale of an infringing article, is individually liable.[73]

[a] Officers of nonresident corporation, made defendants and served with process in a suit for infringement of a patent while acting for the corporation, may be restrained from such infringement, although the cor-

Fact that assignor of patent enters service of corporation which infringes a patent does not necessarily make him an infringer;[74] affirmative acts on his part are necessary.[75]

Person having various relations with corporation may so participate in infringement as to be responsible with the corporation.[76]

[§ 547] (4) Public Bodies, Officers, and Contractors.[77] Officer or agent of United States, acting under orders of the government, is personally liable for his infringement of a patent;[78] but no injunction will issue[79] to restrain the use by him, in his official capacity, of property owned or leased by the United States;[80] he is not liable for profits where none have accrued to him individually,[81] and where no ground for equitable relief, by injunction, an accounting of profits, or otherwise, is shown, the proper remedy of plaintiff is an action at law for damages.[82]

Contractor with United States. By virtue of a federal statute providing that, when a patented invention is used or manufactured by or for the United States without license or lawful right, the remedy of the owner of the patent is by suit against the United States for the recovery of reasonable and entire compensation for such use and manufacture,[83] an injunction,[84] or an accounting as to profits or damages,[85] will not be decreed in a suit against a contractor, who, in accordance with the requirements of a contract with the United States, is constructing or manufacturing an article, device, or structure embodying a patented invention; but the statute does not apply where a contractor, for his own convenience, without the knowledge of the government, and without being required to do so by the contract with the government, uses a patented invention in doing government work.[86]

Municipal corporation may be liable for infringement of a patent,[87] and it may be jointly liable with a contractor[88] and a surety company which has executed a bond indemnifying the city against damages for infringement,[89] but it is not liable for profits from the infringement where it has not realized any.[90]

County commissioners will not be enjoined from operating an infringing ventilating device installed in a courthouse.[91]

Co. v. Random Knitting Co., 217 Fed. 796 (an officer is liable where he acted with full knowledge and was the procuring cause of the infringement); National Car-Brake Shoe Co. v. Terre Haute Car, etc., Co., 19 Fed. 514 (whenever officers actually participate in the infringement, they are liable in an action at law).

[a] Reasons for rule.—"The duty of the commissioners to build and equip courthouses is a duty or function which concerns the people of the state at large. Their duty to maintain a courthouse once erected seems to be of the same sort. Rev. Laws Mass. c 20, generally, and especially sections 5 and 24. For the most part,

[§ 548] b. Joinder of Defendants. Joint infringers,[92] or an infringer and a contributory infringer,[93] may be joined as defendants; but it is improper to join two or more defendants where they are charged only with several and individual infringement.[94] The owner of infringing machines and a lessee from him may be joined as defendants in a suit for infringement.[95] Also, a person who is pecuniarily interested in the manufacture of an infringing article and acts as agent for its sale may be joined with the manufacturer as a defendant in a suit for infringement.[96]

Owner, part owner, or assignor, of patent. In a suit by an exclusive licensee[97] against a third person for infringement, the owner of the patent may be made a party defendant where he is within the jurisdiction of the court[98] and is hostile to the licensee.[99] Where, in a suit against a third person for infringement of an assigned patent, plaintiff relies upon the assignment as creating an estoppel to deny validity of the patent, the assignor is an indispensable party.[1] Also, where defendant pleads a counterclaim for infringement of another patent and he is only a part owner of such patent, his coöwners are necessary parties.[2]

In suit against private corporation. A private corporation and its receiver,[3] an individual who owns all, or practically all, its stock and personally directs its affairs,[4] a person who conceived, built up, and managed the business of the corporation,[5] or individuals who organized the corporation with a small capital for the sole purpose of enabling them as individuals to make and sell an infringing article through the corporation without being subject to personal liability,[6] may be joined as defendants in a suit for infringement of a patent. Officers of a private corporation are neither necessary nor proper parties defendant in a suit in equity against the corporation for the infringement of a patent where they have performed no act of infringement,[7] and were not pecuniarily interested therein;[8] but such officers, where they have personally infringed and are joint tort-feasors, may be made codefendants with the corporation,[9] and may also, for injunctive purposes, be made codefendants, where they have, in their capacity as officers of the corporation, actively participated in an infringement.[10] Where a corporation is conducting the business complained of, it is a necessary party to a suit in equity against an individual who has left its service.[11]

[§ 549] c. Intervention or Addition of Parties Defendant.[12] The general rules as to intervention, in so far as they obtain and are applicable in suits in federal courts,[13] apply in a suit for infringement of a patent.[14] In an action against a corporation, another corporation which has, during the pendency of an accounting proceeding, and with knowledge thereof, purchased the assets and assumed the liabilities of defendant, may be added as a defendant;[15] but, after the master has taken an accounting, complainant will not be permitted to bring in officers or directors of defendant corporation for the purpose of charging them with individual liability.[16]

the use of a courthouse is not that which is limited to the inhabitants of the county. To close the commonwealth's courts is to assail its sovereignty rather than to incommode the citizens of Essex county. Even if ventilation be less necessary to the holding of a court than are light and heat, concerning which proposition no opinion is here expressed, yet to deny ventilation to a courtroom is at the least to embarrass the administration of the state's justice. For these reasons I am of opinion that no injunction should issue to restrain the defendant commissioners from operating the ventilating machinery, even if they thereby infringe the complainant's patent." of the court, be permitted to intervene in an infringement suit against a dealer in, or user of, the article where such intervention appears necessary to simplify and completely administer justice under the facts of the particular case,[17] but he will not be permitted to intervene where he delays making application to intervene until after the original parties have settled the controversy[18] or another case for infringement of the same patent has been decided.[19] Where the manufacturer assumes the defense of the suit he may, on his own application, be made a formal party to the record,[20] but he will not be required, upon the application of complainant, to become a party to the record,[21] or at least he will not be so required where he has not made a general appearance,[22] is not an inhabitant of, and does not have a regular and established place of business in, the district wherein the suit was brought,[23] and hence is not within the statute relating to venue,[24] even though his defense of the suit will render him privy to, and bound by, any decree that may be rendered.[25] A contest of the case by a manufacturer, after he has intervened and the original defendant has sold his property and business to complainant, requires it to be decided on its merits.[26]

Intermediate purchaser and seller will not be permitted to intervene in a suit against a dealer where his presence as a party is entirely unnecessary,[27] as where the defense which he seeks to set up is equally open to defendant,[28] and the person seeking intervention may, if he so desires, assume the burden of conducting the defense without becoming a party.[29]

[§ 550] 7. Process. A federal statute, providing that, if a suit for infringement of a patent is brought in a district of which defendant is not an inhabitant, but in which he has a regular and established place of business, service of process, summons, or subpœna may be made upon the agent or agents engaged in conducting the business in the district,[30] applies to a case within its terms,[31] although not where defendant does not have a regular and established place of business in the district,[32] or is not doing or conducting business therein;[33] and service upon a person as agent cannot be sustained under the statute where he is not an agent of defendant,[34] or, if an agent, is not conducting defendant's business in the district.[35] The statute does not exclude service upon an officer of a corporation defendant where he is found within the district;[36] but service upon a person who is neither defendant nor an officer, agent, servant, representative, or employee of defendant is not sufficient.[37]

[§ 551] 8. Pleading[38]—a. In General. The pleadings in an action, whether in equity or at law, should be so plain, specific, definite, and certain that the court may know on inspection thereof whether the suit is for infringement of letters patent, or merely to recover damages for the breach of a contract relating to such patent.[39]

In Canada there is no difference between the rules governing the pleadings in an action for infringement of a patent and those governing the pleadings in any other ordinary action.[40]

[§ 552] b. In Actions at Law—(1) In General. Generally speaking, the pleadings in an action at law for infringement of a patent must conform to the rules of the courts of the state wherein the suit is brought;[41] but the permission granted by statute to plead the general issue and give notice of certain special matters of defense to be proved at the trial[42] furnishes an exception to this requirement.[43]

[§ 553] (2) Petition or Declaration. The declaration in an action at law for infringement of a patent must state a cause of action[44] by identifying the patent sued on[45] and alleging plaintiff's title thereto,[46] the giving of notice of the patent by mark-

[a] Profert of patent held sufficient.—Wilder v. McCormick, 29 F. Cas. No. 17,650, 2 Blatchf. 31, Fish. Pat. R. 128.

[b] Reference to patent makes it part of complaint.—Graham v. Earl, 82 Fed. 737.

[c] Statement of substance (1) of the patent is sufficient. Tryon v. White, 24 F. Cas. No. 14,208, Pet. C. C. 96, 1 Robb Pat. Cas. 64. (2) The particulars contained in the specification need not be stated. Gray v. James, 10 F. Cas. No. 5,719, Pet. C. C. 476, 1 Robb Pat. Cas. 140 [foll Cutting v. Myers, 6 F. Cas. No. 3,520, 1 Robb Pat. Cas. 159, 4 Wash. C. C. 220].

[d] Oyer of patent cannot be demanded. Singer v. Wilson, 22 F. Cas. No. 12,901. Contra Cutting v. Myers, 6 F. Cas. No. 3,520, 1 Robb Pat. Cas. 94, 4 Wash. C. C. 220.

46. Cutting v. Myers, supra; Gray v. James, 10 F. Cas. No. 5,719, Pet. C. C. 476, 1 Robb Pat. Cas. 140.

[a] Title dependent on performance of certain acts.—If plaintiff's title depends upon the performance of certain acts he must in his declaration aver the performance of those

ing the article or otherwise,[47] infringement by defendant,[48] and damage to plaintiff therefrom.[49] Also, the petition or declaration must allege facts showing that the suit is brought in the proper district.[50] On the other hand it is not necessary to allege the time of invention[51] or infringement within the period to which damages are limited by statute;[52] where it is alleged that the patent was lawfully issued or granted, it is not necessary to allege specifically the preliminary steps leading to the grant of the patent;[53] critical and overnice objections to matters of form will not be sustained;[54] and where an allegation is too general, the defect may be cured by a verdict for plaintiff.[55]

Demurrer. The question of the validity of a patent on its face may be raised by demurrer in an action at law for its infringement;[56] but except in that class of cases where the court can see that the patent is so void that no question of fact can arise, it is not expedient to anticipate on demurrer a result at which the court may properly arrive after a trial upon the merits and an opportunity to give testimony.[57]

Amendment. An assignee of a patent who did not, at the time he instituted the suit, have a cause of action for infringement committed prior to the assignment of the patent will not be permitted to amend his declaration so as to set up an assignment of such cause of action after the commencement of the suit.[58]

[§ 554] (3) Plea, Answer, or Notice.[59] By virtue of express statutory provision, defendant in an action at law for infringement of a patent[60] may plead the general issue,[61] and, having given proper[62] and timely[63] notice in writing to plaintiff or his attorney,[64] may prove at the trial any one or more of several special defenses therein enumerated.[65] As the statute is permissive merely,[66] it does not prevent special pleas under ordinary rules;[67] and it is proper to present by special plea, without notice, acts. Gray v. James, 10 F. Cas. No. 5,719, Pet. C. C. 476, 1 Robb Pat. Cas. 140.

[b] Title by assignment.—(1) If the title of plaintiff is derived from assignments of the patent the declaration should so state (Van Hook v. Wood, 28 F. Cas. No. 16,854), (2) but it is not necessary for plaintiff to set forth a perfect instrument of assignment in order to maintain his action (Van Hook v. Wood, supra). (3) A declaration averring that the inventor did, before the issuance of letters patent, assign his right, title, and interest in the invention or design to plaintiff, is not open to the objection that it does not allege that the assignment was made after the application for the patent, as an invention may be assigned as well before as after the application for a patent. Rathbone v. Orr, 20 F. Cas. No. 11,585, Fish. Pat. R. 355, 5 McLean 131. (4) The declaration need not aver that the assignment of the patent to plaintiff was recorded in the patent office (Case v. Redfield, 5 F. Cas. No. 2,494, 4 McLean 526, 2 Robb Pat. Cas. 741), (5) as recording is necessary only to afford notice to bona fide purchasers and not as between the parties or as against strangers (see supra § 383). (6) Assignments generally see supra §§ 366-407.

[a] Disjunctive averment that defendant sold or contracted to sell is bad. Noe v. Prentice, 18 F. Cas. No. 10,284a.

[b] Lack of authority to use.—Where plaintiff shows that a named person has the right to use his invention and to authorize other persons in the United States to use the same, in order to make a prima facie case against a third person for using the patent, it must affirmatively appear by the petition that such use is not under the authority or license of the person competent to grant it. Still v. Reading, 9 Fed. 40, 4 Woods 345.

49. See cases infra this note.

[a] Facts as to damage and not evidence must be alleged, so that there may be an issue. Rude v. Wescott, 130 U. S. 152, 9 SCt 463, 32 L. ed. 888; Ewart Mfg. Co. v. Baldwin Cycle-Chain Co., 91 Fed. 262.

[b] Conclusion demanding damages in gross.—In an action on the case, the gravamen being the tortious infringement of plaintiff's patent, a demand of damages in gross is a proper conclusion of the declaration. Wilder v. McCormick, 29 F. Cas. No. 17,650, 2 Blatchf. 31, Fish. Pat. R. 128.

[c] Petition construed to present a case for damages at law and not to allege facts constituting a basis for the ascertainment of profits. Portland Gold Min. Co. v. Hermann, 160 Fed. 91, 87 CCA 247.

50. Shaw v. American Tobacco Co., 108 Fed. 842, 48 CCA 68.

[a] Rule applied.—"To give the court below jurisdiction, the petition failing to show that the defendant is an inhabitant of the district in which it is sued, it is necessary that it should aver that the act of infringement complained of was committed in the district, and that the defendant had a regular and established place of business in the district. If it be conceded that the petition sufficiently shows that the defendant has a regular and established place of business in the district in which the suit was brought, the petition contains no averment showing where the acts of infringement were committed. It is not alleged that the acts were committed at any named place. It does not appear from the petition that the acts of infringement were committed in the district in which the suit is brought. The petition, therefore, on its face, does not show that the court below had jurisdiction." Shaw v. American Tobacco Co., 108 Fed. 842, 844, 48 CCA 68.

[a] Declaration embodying essential matters.—Although the declaration is not formal in its frame, yet where it embodies all that is essential to enable plaintiff to give evidence of his right and of its violation by defendant, and affords to defendant the opportunity to interpose every defense allowed him by law, the court will not encourage objections merely critical and overnice, but will seek, even on special demurrer, to sustain pleadings substantially sufficient, and thus avoid useless delays and expenses. [a] Patentability of subject matter.—The question whether or not the subject matter of a patent is within one of the classes of things which are patentable under the statute is purely one of law, and may be determined on demurrer in an action for its infringement. American Disappearing Bed Co. v. Arnaelsteen, 182 Fed. 324, 105 CCA 40 [certiorari den 220 U. S. 622 mem, 31 SCt 724 mem, 55 L. ed. 613 mem].

either a defense not specified in the statute[68] or a defense which, under the statute, might be the subject of notice under the general issue;[69] but if notice of special matter of defense is given, a plea covering the same matter cannot be filed.[70]

Requisites of notice. The notice of special matters of defense authorized by statute[71] must be definite and certain as to name, place, and subject matter,[72] and must be given thirty days before trial.[73] It may be given in the answer[74] and need not be under oath.[75]

In Canada the well settled practice in patent infringement cases is for the statement of defense to state merely the general outlines of the defense,[76] and these outlines are subsequently filled in and interpreted by particulars[77] on a proper demand therefor.[78]

[§ 555] (4) Reply or Replication. Plaintiff may put in a replication to meet a plea of new matter in avoidance,[79] such as a plea of release[80] or a decree in former litigation between the same parties;[81] but the replication should not go behind the case made by the declaration, and add another and different cause of action.[82] A notice of special matter to be proved at the trial does not require a reply.[83]

[§ 556] c. In Suits in Equity[84]—(1) Original Bill[85]—(a) In General. A bill in equity for infringement of a patent must state a cause of action.[86] The form[87] and requisites[88] of the bill have been settled by the practice and decisions, and have not been changed by the federal equity rules,[89] or at least they have not been changed in respect of allegations of the facts essential to entitle the patentee to a patent.[90] After alleging the requisite matters,[91] the bill should conclude with a proper prayer,[92] and, where special relief pending the suit is desired, it should be verified by the oath of plaintiff or some one having knowledge of the facts upon which the relief is asked.[93] In England there must be an oath that the patentee was the first and orig-

[a] Prayer for surrender and destruction of all apparatus used or intended for use in the alleged infringement is, it seems, improper in a bill for infringement of a patent covering only a process or method. Schaum & Uhlinger, Inc. v. Copley-Plaza Operating Co., 243 Fed. 924.

[b] Enforcement of decree and orders granted in another district.—A prayer that an interlocutory decree rendered in another district shall operate as an estoppel and that defendants be denied all right to plead to the merits, but not asking that defendants be adjudged infringers, or for an injunction, except that the court enforce the injunction orders granted upon the interlocutory decree in the other district, is insufficient. Kehoe v. Bradford, 175 Fed. 800.

[c] Damages and profits.—(1) It is not necessary that the bill pray for damages eo nomine; where the bill asks for an account of gains and profits and such other relief as may be agreeable to equity, damages may be awarded to complainant. Emerson v. Simm, 8 F. Cas. No. 4,443, 6 Fish. Pat. Cas. 281. (2) "The allegations of the plaintiff's bill of complaint are not sufficient to warrant any recovery by the plaintiff of any damages suffered by his licensees, and further plaintiff does not pray for the recovery of any damages suffered by the licensees, but only the gains and profits of the defendant, and damages suffered by the plaintiff. This, however, does not prevent the plaintiff from recovering the gains and profits of the defendant and damages suffered by the plaintiff, because it does not appear that any one has any interest, legal or equitable, by assignment or otherwise, in the patent sued on, or that the licensees mentioned are other than licensees at sufferance." inal inventor of the subject matter of the patent,[94] but in the United States a special oath or affidavit as to this fact is necessary when,[95] and only when,[96] the fact is not alleged in the bill. The making of a particular averment on information and belief is not fatal where the averment is unnecessary and might be wholly omitted;[97] nor does it necessarily render the bill insufficient where the averment is of material facts,[98] although it may preclude the use of the bill as an affidavit upon a motion.[99]

[§ 557] (b) Allegations of Particular Matters—aa. Jurisdiction and Venue. The bill must contain allegations showing that a right to an injunction, or some other ground of equitable jurisdiction, exists;[1] and it must also allege facts showing that the suit is brought in the proper district[2] within the statute relating to venue;[3] but as jurisdiction of a patent infringement suit does not depend upon the amount involved,[4] an averment of such amount is unnecessary.[5]

[§ 558] bb. Diligence.[6] Where delay sufficient to constitute laches, if unexcused, appears on the face of the pleading, the bill should show a sufficient excuse or reason for the delay;[7] but where the suit is brought within the statutory period, the absence of a specific allegation that plaintiff has been diligent is not fatal.[8]

[§ 559] cc. Identity and Ownership of Claim, Patent, or Invention. The bill may and should clearly identify the patented invention[9] either by giving an adequate description thereof[10] or by describing or referring to it generally and making profert of the patent,[11] but, although the patent contains two or more claims, it is not necessary at the outset to specify which claim or claims are relied on.[12] Ownership of the patent by plaintiff[13] at the time of filing the bill[14] should be alleged; but it is not necessary to allege the various assignments by which title was acquired;[15] nor is it necessary to allege the recording of an assignment.[16] In order to recover damages for infringements committed prior to an assignment of the patent, the assignee must allege in his bill that the claims for such damages were assigned to him.[17]

[§ 560] dd. Issuance and Validity of Patent. A bill for infringement of a patent should allege not only the issuance of the patent[18] in proper form,[19] but also all the facts which are statutory prerequisites to the grant of a valid patent,[20] such as the facts that the patentee invented or discovered the subject matter of the patent;[21] that the invention was not owned or used in this country prior to his invention or discovery;[22] that it was not patented or described in any printed publication in this country or any foreign country before his invention or discovery;[23] that it was not in public use or on sale in this country for more than two years prior to his application for the patent;[24] that no application for a foreign patent for the invention was filed more than twelve months prior to the filing of the application in this country;[25] and that the invention was not abandoned.[26] Averments of the facts required by statute must be made positively,[27] rather than on belief,[28] and the necessity of making them is not dispensed with by a general equity rule providing for a short and simple statement of the ultimate facts upon which plaintiff asks relief,[29] as the facts required by statute are regarded as ultimate facts within the meaning of the rule.[30] However, it is not necessary to allege the filing of an application for a patent in due form[31] or the proceedings in the patent office in an interference case;[32] nor is it necessary in a suit for infringement of a reissued patent to allege specifically the ground on which reissue was obtained.[33]

Estoppel. Where complainant relies on defendant's estoppel to contest the validity of the patent, he should plead the estoppel.[34]

Long-felt want or demand for the subject matter of the patent may properly be pleaded as indicating patentable invention.[35]

unless no preliminary injunction is sought.[38]

[§ 561] ee. Infringement. The bill must allege infringement by defendant.[39] In England particulars should be stated,[40] but in the United States a general allegation[41] upon information and belief[42] is sufficient.

[§ 562] ff. Damages and Profits.[43] The extent of complainant's damages need not be averred in the bill where the suit is brought for an injunction alone[44] or for profits in addition thereto;[45] but if an accounting is prayed for the bill must allege that defendant has made profits from the sale or use of the patented invention;[46] and in order to recover damages, the bill must aver that complainant has complied with the statute either by marking his article "patented" or by notifying defendant of the infringement.[47]

[§ 563] (2) Plea, Answer, or Notice[48]—(a) In General. While, generally speaking, such defenses as defendant wishes to assert must be set up in the answer,[49] and defenses not so set up will not be considered by the court in rendering its decision,[50] yet the defense of nonpatentability can be availed of without setting it up in the answer,[51] and, under the federal equity rules, every defense in point of law arising upon the face of the bill, which might previously have been made by plea, may be made either by motion to dismiss or in the answer.[52] The allegations of the answer must be sufficiently definite and precise to inform plaintiff what defense he has to meet.[53] More than one defense may be presented in the answer,[54] even though the defenses are inconsistent;[55] but each should be separately[56] and clearly[57] alleged without condition or qualifica-

Pleas have been abolished by the federal equity rules.[60]

[§ 564] (b) Notice or Pleading of Statutory Defenses. The statute making provision, in actions at law, for the giving of written notice of any one or more of enumerated special matters of defense[61] provides for the pleading of like defenses, and the giving of like notice in the answer, in a suit in equity.[62] In order to render any of the defenses mentioned in the statute available,[63] notice thereof may[64] and must[65] be given in the answer, or, in other words, they must be pleaded.[66] An answer, or notice in the answer, purporting to set up a statutory defense must contain statements or allegations sufficient to present the defense[67] with definiteness and certainty;[68] and in cases falling within a statute providing that, in notices of previous invention, knowledge, or use of anything patented, defendant shall state the names of the patentees, the dates of their patents, and when granted, the names and residences of the persons alleged to have invented or to have had prior knowledge of the thing patented, and where and by whom it had been used,[69] there must be a compliance with the statute;[70] but notice of the names and places of residence of the witnesses by whom it is intended to prove prior knowledge and use is not required;[71] and, in giving notice, defendant is not bound to be so specific as to relieve his adversary from all inquiry or effort to investigate the facts,[72] or to impose an unnecessary and embarrassing restriction on his own right of producing proof of what he asserts.[73] The notice

67. See cases infra this note.

[a] Insufficient allegations.—(1) An allegation that a prior machine was built by a person named is not an allegation of prior use by that person. Tatum v. Eby, 60 Fed. 408. (2) An answer not setting forth that the invention was patented to any one, but that it was "fully described and publicly made known in several patents," mentioning the names and dates of the same, does not sufficiently set up the statutory defense of a prior patent of the invention, for the invention might have been described and publicly made known by a patent without being patented. Saunders v. Allen, 53 Fed. 109, 110 [aff 60 Fed. 610, 9 CCA 157].

Howland Falls Pulp Co., 70 Fed. 986 [rev on other grounds 80 Fed. 395, 25 CCA 500; Clark v. Scott, 5 F. Cas. No. 2,833, 9 Blatchf. 301, 5 Fish. Pat. Cas. 245; Doughty v. West, 7 F. Cas. No. 4,029, 2 Fish. Pat. Cas. 553; Gear v. Grosvenor, 10 F. Cas. No. 5,291, 6 Fish. Pat. Cas. 314, Holmes 215. (2) An answer alleging in the language of the statute that the specifications as made contain less than the whole truth relative to the invention, and more than was necessary to produce the desired effect which the law assigns to the specification, is too general to require the attention of the court where the details of fraud or subterfuge are not specifically set up. American Sulphite Pulp Co. v. Howland Falls Pulp Co., supra.

[b] Distinction as to dates.—In pleading defenses in a suit for infringement, the distinction should be carefully observed between the pleading of patents, and printed publications, which, as disclosures, take effect only from the date of issue, and allegations of priority of invention, in which actual dates of invention are to be the subject of testimony. [a] Notice is sufficient (1) where it fairly supplies plaintiff with guides to the sources of, and the means of verifying, defendant's proofs. Smith v. Frazer, 22 F. Cas. No. 13,048, 5 Fish. Pat. Cas. 543. (2) Where the answer of defendants showing they were residents of a certain place gave notice that they were prepared to prove that certain named persons who were defendants themselves had for over four years prior to the application for the patent in suit used and sold the articles described in the patent, and it was objected that the answer did not state the names and places of residence of the persons by whom and where the articles were used, it was held that the object of the statutory requirement was to apprise plaintiff of the nature of the evidence which he must be ready to meet at the trial, and that the answer substantially and fully accomplished this. Anderson v. Miller, 129 U. S. 70, 32 L. ed. 635. (3) Likewise, notice of the defense of prior invention by a named person was not insufficient, although his address was omitted, where the notice identified him as the president of one of the defendants, a corporation which bore his name. J. H. Day Co. v. Mountain City Mill Co., 264 Fed. 963 [aff 257 Fed. 561] (no one could well have failed to understand his identity).

need not be under oath.[74]

[§ 565] (3) Cross Bill or Counterclaim. Provided jurisdiction of the person of plaintiff in respect of the counterclaim exists,[75] defendant may, under the federal equity rules,[76] assert a counterclaim for infringement of another patent,[77] where it is related,[78] or even where it is unrelated,[79] to the subject matter of the patent or transaction in suit. Also, defendant may interpose a counterclaim charging plaintiff with interference with defendant's business by circulating false statements concerning defendant's property and making false threats of suits against defendant's customers, and asking for an injunction and damages.[80] On the other hand, a counterclaim for a cause of action strictly legal cannot be interposed,[81] nor, where the case is not within the statute, can defendant pursue by counterclaim the statutory remedy accorded an applicant for a patent which has been refused.[82] The patent in suit cannot be impeached by a counterclaim.[83] Except as modified by the federal equity rules relating to set-offs and counterclaims,[84] the general rules relating to cross bills[85] apply to cross bills in patent infringement suits.[86] Thus a cross bill must be germane to the original bill,[87] and not include mere matters of defense.[88]

[§ 566] (4) Supplemental Bill. The general rules relating to supplemental bills[89] apply in suits for infringement of patents.[90] The allowance or refusal of leave to file such a bill is largely a matter of discretion.[91] Plaintiff may be allowed to file a supplemental bill for the purpose of setting up an adjudication of the validity of the patent in another circuit after the filing of the original bill in the present case,[92] or for the purpose of bringing in new parties[93] where the addition of such parties is proper;[94] but an assignee of the patent may not file a supplemental bill setting up a claim for past damages assigned to him since the filing of the original bill;[95] and ordinarily where a patent, during the pendency of a suit thereon, is surrendered and a reissue is granted, it is not proper to file a supplemental bill founded on the reissued patent,[96] although, where defendant does not object, the court may disregard the irregularity:[97] It is neither necessary nor proper to file a supplemental bill setting up acts of infringement committed after the commencement of the suit,[98] or to prevent infringement covered by an injunction in force.[99]

Supplementary bill in nature of bill of review may be filed where it is based upon newly discovered evidence,[1] unless the evidence might have been discovered originally;[2] but leave to file such a bill to obtain consideration of certain matters will be denied where, if they had been considered, they would not have changed the result.[3]

[§ 567] (5) Bill of Particulars.[4] Although the bill sufficiently states the ultimate facts,[5] nevertheless, upon defendant's motion,[6] the court, in its discretion,[7] may order plaintiff to state in a bill of particulars the precise right asserted by him[8] and the precise trespass upon that right alleged to have been committed by defendant,[9] or, in other words, the particular claims of the patent which plaintiff

[a] Reason for rule is that (1) full and complete relief (Minerals Separation v. Miami Copper Co., 264 Fed. 528; Westinghouse Air Brake Co. v. Christensen Engineering Co., 126 Fed. 764), (2) not only by way of injunction (Minerals Separation v. Miami Copper Co., supra), (3) but also in the accounting (Minerals Separation v. Miami Copper Co., supra; Westinghouse Air Brake Co. v. Christensen Engineering Co., 126 Fed. 764 [writ of error dism 129 Fed. 96, 63 CCA 598 mem]), (4) may be had under the original bill. Accounting covering acts of infringement to date of master's report see infra § 637.

[b] In cases not directly involving point, as in cases where, on account of doubt as to the violation of an injunction, the court refused to adjudge defendant in contempt, it was suggested that plaintiff might proceed by supplemental bill. See infra § 611.

[a] Where plaintiff alleges colorable imitation of his patented article, defendant is entitled to particulars of breaches in order that he may be informed in what particular respects plaintiff alleges that defendant's article is an infringement. Kleinert intends to rely on as having been infringed,[10] and the particular articles manufactured or sold,[11] or the particular parts, elements, or steps used,[12] by defendant, which plaintiff will rely on to establish infringement; but plaintiff will not be required to identify infringing machines by reference to their location in the hands of purchasers from defendant;[13] nor will he be required to parallel and compare each part, element, or step set forth in a claim of the patent with alleged infringing parts, elements, or steps in defendant's structure or process.[14] Likewise, where defendant sets up matters of anticipation or the like, he may be required to state precisely the matters relied upon by way of defense,[15] as, for example, where he pleads numerous patents, publications, or instances of prior knowledge and use, he may be ordered to indicate specifically the ones he will rely on at the trial;[16] but he will not be required to specify by appropriate reference characters the part of each of the patents or printed publications upon which he will rely,[17] nor will he be required to illustrate or explain the instances of prior knowledge or use,[18] or to furnish drawings of a device alleged as an anticipation.[19] On defendant's motion for a bill of particulars, plaintiff will not be required to fix the date of the patented invention,[20] but on plaintiff's motion his disclosure to defendant of the dates of the conception and reduction to practice of the patented invention may be required as a condition of ordering defendant to state the approximate dates of prior use or knowledge.[21] Neither party will be required to state reasons, arguments, or opinions in a bill of particulars.[22]

This rule has grown up because of the fact that litigants often allege or 'throw in' a lot of patents, which they have no serious intention of contending have any particular relevancy to the issues in suit." abolished by the federal equity rules. Immaterial allegations in the bill[26] or answer[27] will be stricken out on motion; but a motion to strike out on this ground will be denied where the allegations in question have a bearing on the relief sought.[28] Objections to the bill which are highly technical and easily susceptible of correction should be insisted upon by defendant before the hearing,[29] and will not be sustained when made for the first time in the written briefs.[30]

[§ 569] (7) Amendments. In accordance with the principles governing the amendments of pleadings in equitable suits generally,[31] and especially the rules of court governing the amendments of pleadings in equitable suits in federal courts,[32] amendments of the bill[33] or answer[34] in a suit for infringement of a patent may be allowed; but where the answer is amended so as to set up a statutory defense, the provision of the statute requiring thirty days' notice[35] should be given effect.[36] In the discretion of the court,[37] an application for leave to amend the bill[38] or answer[39] may be denied where there has been undue delay in making the application. An amendment of the answer will not be allowed where it would be inconsistent with the answer as filed;[40] defendant concedes that he has no proof of the subject matter of the amendment;[41] or, where, if the facts shown by movant's affidavits were shown on final hearing, plaintiff's patent would not be defeated.[42] Also a motion to amend the answer so as to set up a new defense will not be regarded favorably where the new defense is dependent wholly on parol evidence.[43] Authority to grant the amendment being established, the court may properly allow it to be entered nunc pro tunc.[44]

Plaintiff may be ordered to amend his bill, on defendant's motion, so as to specify the claims of the patent alleged to have been infringed where the patent contains numerous claims and it would be unreasonable to require defendant to prepare an answer as to all of them.[45]

[§ 570] 9. Evidence and Issues, Proof, and Variance[46]—a. In General. In a suit for infringement of a patent plaintiff has the burden of proving his case[47] and each and every essential element thereof;[48] but evidence of the grant of the patent and of infringement thereof presents a prima facie case,[49] which defendant must overcome in order to prevent a decree for plaintiff.[50] As in other civil actions,[51] the proof must correspond to the pleadings[52] and be relevant to the issues raised thereby.[53] Ex parte affidavits are not admissible.[54]

[§ 571] b. As to Particular Matters—(1) Title of Plaintiff. The title of plaintiff to the patent in suit is prima facie made out by proof of the issuance[55] or assignment[56] of the patent to him. Where defendant has filed a plea that the patent in suit is his property rather than the property of plaintiff, and plaintiff has filed a replication thereto, the burden of proof on the issue thus joined rests upon defendant.[57]

[§ 572] (2) Notice. When put in issue by the pleadings, the giving of notice of the patent by marking the patented article or otherwise,[58] the date of the notice,[59] and the commission of infringing acts thereafter,[60] must be proved by plaintiff to entitle him to recover damages,[61] and his evidence on this subject must conform to the allegations of the bill.[62]

[§ 573] (3) Venue, Laches, and Limitations. Unless alleged in the bill and not denied in the answer,[63] facts showing the jurisdiction of the particular district court in which the suit is brought must be proved by plaintiff;[64] they cannot be presumed or inferred.[65] Thus in an action against a nonresident, plaintiff has the burden of proving not only that an act of infringement was committed in the district,[66] but also that defendant has a regular and established place of business therein.[67] Ordinarily defendant has the burden of proving laches,[68] but where there has been a long delay, it is incumbent upon plaintiff to explain or excuse it.[69] Defendant may, under the general issue, show that the infringement was not committed within the statutory period of limitation for the recovery of damages.[70]

[§ 574] (4) Existence, Validity, Scope, and Construction of Patent[71]—(a) Presumptions and Burden of Proof. The various presumptions in favor of the validity of a patent[72] are available to plaintiff in a suit for infringement thereof.[73] These presumptions should be given more than mere formal recognition,[74] especially where an agent has appropriated the patented invention of his principal[75] or an infringer has copied the patented invention

55. See cases infra this note.

[a] Proof supporting allegations of bill.—Title in plaintiff is prima facie made out by proof supporting the allegations of the bill that plaintiff is the true, original, and first inventor of the device, that he applied for a patent, that a patent was issued to him, that he and his licensees are and have been manufacturing devices in accordance with the terms of the patent, and that they are supplying them to the trade. Wahl v. N. E. Norstrom Electric Mfg. Co., 19 F. (2d) 544 [aff 27 F. (2d) 635].

[b] Presumption of continued ownership.—Where the patent was granted to plaintiff, and no assignment by him is alleged or proved, he is presumed to be still the owner of it. Fischer v. Neil, 6 Fed. 89.

56. Hildreth v. Auerbach, 223 Fed. 545 [aff 223 Fed. 651, 139 CCA 205].

[a] Confirmatory assignment.—In an action by an assignee, a confirmatory assignment which is received in evidence without objection and refers to a prior assignment which has been lost or mislaid may prima facie correct any deficiency of proof consisting of a failure to show an assignment prior to the commencement of the action. American Optical Co. v. Shur-On Optical Co., 9 F. (2d) 932 [aff 16 F. (2d) 1013, and certiorari den 274 U. S. 742 mem, 47 SCt 587 mem, 71 L. ed. 1321 mem].

[b] Assignment prior to issuance of patent.—Where the bill alleges that the patent was issued to another applicant as assignee, it will be presumed, until the contrary is shown, that an assignment sufficient to pass title was before the patent office. Schaum & Uhlinger, Inc. v. Copley-Plaza Operating Co., 243 Fed. 924.

[c] Delivery.—That an assignment of a patent was recorded and is produced and put in evidence by a subsequent assignee in a suit for infringement is sufficient evidence of its delivery. Shelby Steel Tube Co. v. Delaware Seamless Tube Co., 151 Fed. 64 [aff 160 Fed. 928].

[a] Admission.—(1) Where the bill alleged notice, without alleging any date, any answer, denying infringement at any time without expressly denying notice, admitted notice but not notice at any particular time, and did not relieve plaintiff from the burden of proving the date of notice. Lorain Steel Co. v. New York Switch, etc., Co., 153 Fed. 205. (2) Also, where the bill alleged notice to defendant of the infringement without alleging any date, an answer admitting that complainant sent notices to defendant's customers and prospective customers in reference to a pretended infringement, which notices, in September, 1911, were brought to defendant's attention, and denying all unlawful acts with which defendant is charged, admitted notice of the infringement as early as September, 1911, but sufficiently put in issue the giving of notice earlier than that date. down to its most minute details.[76] While the presumption of validity is not so strong,[77] or will be given only its minimum effect,[78] where the patent was granted without due consideration of the prior art, and a like rule obtains where the patent was issued because of fraud, misrepresentation, or mistake,[79] nevertheless the conditions necessary to render these rules applicable may not rest upon presumption.[80] Defendant has the burden of proving the invalidity of the patent,[81] unless infringement is asserted by a cross bill, in which case the burden rests on plaintiff in the original bill;[82] but where defendant shows use by others before the application, the burden of proof shifts to the patentee to show prior invention;[83] where plaintiff claims that the present commercial form of his invention is not a departure from the original disclosure, he has the burden of proving that any journeyman of the art could turn from the present form to the former with some certainty of result;[84] and where plaintiff, suing as an assignee of the patent, seeks a holding that defendant is estopped to deny the validity of the patent, he has the burden of showing such privity between defendant and the assignor as estops defendant.[85] The patentee does not have the burden of establishing the truth of an affidavit made and filed in the patent office many years previously for the purpose of showing priority of invention over other patents cited as anticipations.[86]

[§ 575] (b) Admissibility—aa. In General. Provided a proper basis therefor is laid in the pleadings or notice of special matter,[87] competent evidence tending to show that the patent is invalid is admissible;[88] but where the patent has previously been held valid by the circuit court of appeals, it is proper to exclude depositions bearing upon the price of a product both before and after the patented machine for making the product was put upon the market.[89] By virtue of statutory provision,[90] a certified copy of any record, book, paper, or drawing belonging to the patent office and of letters patent may be received in evidence in place of the original;[91] the printed copies of specifications and drawings of patents deposited in the capitols of the various states and territories and certified by the commissioner of patents will be received as evidence of all matters therein contained;[92] and a foreign patent may be proved by a copy under seal of the country,[93] or by a copy certified by the commissioner of patents of the United States;[94] but uncertified copies of patents are not admissible in evidence.[95] While admissions made in the prosecution of the application in the patent office may be introduced against the patentee,[96] statements made by him in prosecuting applications for patents other than the one in suit are not admissible,[97] and the court will not issue a certificate that a certain abandoned application in the patent office is probably material and competent in an infringement suit, where the certificate would be effective only as, or in support of, a request to the commissioner of patents to furnish a copy of the application.[98] The record of interference proceedings is admissible in evidence[99] where the proceedings involved the same question as is under consideration in the infringement suit,[1] but not, it is held, where the controversy was between persons with whom defendant is not in privity.[2] While it is improper to exclude evidence tending to show defendant's privity with defendant in another suit wherein the same patent was adjudged valid,[3] it is proper to exclude the record and opinion in another suit between the same parties but not involving the patented invention under consideration in the present suit.[4] A prior foreign publication may be competent as evidence in regard to the state of the art,[5] and as a foundation for an inquiry whether it required invention to pass from a structure set forth in the publication to the patented structure.[6]

Expert testimony. It is for the judge trying a patent infringement suit to decide whether he needs the assistance of experts to understand specifications of patents relied on as prior art.[7] In some districts certain rules of court relating to the testimony of expert witnesses have been adopted for the purpose of confining experts to explanations which are helpful and instructive to the court in enabling it to understand the art.[8] The opinion of an expert as to the construction of the patent in suit is not admissible.[9]

Ex parte tests. In an action for an infringement of a patent for a process and a product, the court in its discretion may properly exclude evidence of the results of tests made by or on behalf of plaintiff and tending to prove the superior qualities of the product resulting from the use of the process,[10] as such evidence is at best merely self-serving,[11] and cannot be considered for the purpose of adding anything to the statements found in the claims and specifications of the patent itself.[12] However, it is not improper to consider ex parte tests of the subject matter of the patented invention or discovery where they appear to have been fairly made[13] and are not objected to on the ground of their ex parte character.[14]

[§ 576] bb. Under Pleadings. Ordinarily evidence bearing upon the scope[15] or validity[16] of the patent may and must correspond to the issues raised by the pleadings, but where plaintiff has introduced evidence of matters not pleaded, defendant may introduce evidence of a defense thereto without amending the answer.[17] Matters alleged by one party and admitted by the other are before the court without being offered in evidence.[18]

Under general issue defendant may show the prior state of the art,[19] that plaintiff's device is not operative,[20-21] or matters, other than statutory defenses, which affect the validity of the patent and cannot well be made the subject of a special plea;[22] and he may give in evidence the act of congress relating to patentability.[23]

Statutory defenses. Under the statute providing for proof at the trial of certain special matters of defense, all relating to the validity of the patent, where defendant has given previous written notice thereof,[24] such matters are admissible in evidence for the purpose of defeating the patent where they have been pleaded or sufficient statutory notice thereof has been given;[25] but not otherwise,[26] unless

24. U. S. Rev. St. § 4920.

[a] Matters enumerated in statute are: "First. That for the purpose of deceiving the public the description and specification filed by the patentee in the Patent-Office was made to contain less than the whole truth relative to his invention or discovery, or more than is necessary to produce the desired effect; or, Second. That he had surreptitiously or unjustly obtained the patent for that which was in fact invented by another, who was using reasonable diligence in adapting and perfecting the same; or, Third. That it has been patented or described in some printed publication prior to his supposed invention or discovery thereof, or more than two years prior to his application for a patent therefor; or, Fourth. That he was not the original and first inventor or discoverer of any material and substantial part of the thing patented; or, Fifth. That it had been in public use or on sale in this country for more than two years before his application for a patent, or had been abandoned to the public." U. S. Rev. St. § 4920.

notice thereof is waived,[27] as by failure to object to the reception of the evidence.[28] However, matters which are inadmissible under the foregoing rule for the purpose of showing the invalidity of the patent[29] may nevertheless be admissible to show the state of the art[30] and to aid in the construction of the patent.[31]

[§ 577] (c) Weight and Sufficiency. It is a general rule that in an action for infringement of a patent defendant has the burden of proving the invalidity of the patent[32] beyond a reasonable doubt;[33] but the rule does not apply where the patent was issued through mistake or inadvertence.[34] Where the patent has previously been adjudged valid in another case, defendant has the burden of establishing prior use by proof which, if presented in the former case, would probably have caused a different decision.[35]

[a] Prior patents and publications (1) are within the rule where they have not been pleaded and statutory notice thereof has not been given. Jorgenson v. Hawkins, 14 F. (2d) 409; Earl v. Dexter, 8 F. Cas. No. 4,242, 1 Bann. & A. 400, Holmes 412; Odiorne v. Denney, 18 F. Cas. No. 10,431, 3 Bann. & A. 287, 1 N. J. L. J. 183. See Troy Laundry Mach. Co. v. International Equipment Co., 278 Fed. 891 (the relevancy of a prior patent offered in evidence is limited and controlled by the pleadings and the position taken on interrogatories). (2) In such case, prior patents are not admissible to show want of novelty in the invention claimed in complainant's patent (Grier v. Wilt, 120 U. S. 412, 7 SCt 718, 30 L. ed. 712; Sodemann Heat, etc., Co. v. Kauffman, 275 Fed. 593 [rev 267 Fed. 435]; Morton v. Llewellyn, 164 Fed. 693, 90 CCA 514; American Saddle Co. v. Hogg, 1 F. Cas. Albert Pick & Co., 251 Fed. 894; Mygatt v. Schaffer, supra. (4) Prior invention by another, or that the patentee was not the first and original inventor. Schumacher v. Buttonlath Mfg. Co., 292 Fed. 522; H. J. Heinz Co. v. Cohn, 207 Fed. 547, 125 CCA 197. And see Roberti v. Jonas, 300 Fed. 181 [aff 7 F. (2d) 563] (a defense that plaintiff did not in fact make the invention claimed but improperly made use of the invention of another as a basis for the patent application must be clearly established by satisfactory evidence). Compare Proctor, etc., Co. v. Berlin Mills Co., 256 Fed. 23, 167 CCA 295 [certiorari granted 249 U. S. 598 mem, 39 SCt 390 mem, 63 L. ed. 795 mem, and rev on other grounds 254 U. S. 156, 41 SCt 75, 65 L. ed. 196] (an affirmative defense that applicant for the patent was not the inventor but appropriated the invention of another must be sustained by a fair preponderance of credible evidence).

[b] Evidence held sufficient to: (1) Sustain verdict that patent is valid. Masonic Hall, etc., Fund v. Fountain Electrical Floor Box Corp., 218 Fed. 642, 134 CCA 663 [aff 210 Fed. 169]. (2) Establish that defendant did not commence making an article which infringed a patent owned by plaintiff as assignee until after the patentee entered plaintiff's employment, and was therefore affected by his estoppel to deny the validity of the patent. Northern Insulating Co. v. Union Fibre Co., 199 Fed. 793.

[c] Evidence held insufficient to: (1) Sustain defense that the invention was placed on sale or offered for sale more than two years prior to the application. Schumacher v. Buttonlath Mfg. corded evidence of experiments out of court,[36] or even experiments in court.[37] More reliance will be placed upon the testimony of experts where electric, magnetic, or chemical patents are involved than where patents for mechanical devices are under consideration;[38] and in a case involving highly technical and complicated matters, little, if any, attention will be paid to prior patents introduced in evidence without explanatory testimony;[39] but where the court is convinced from a consideration of prior patents that the patent in suit is invalid because of anticipation, its conclusion will not be changed by the fact that royalties have been paid for the use of the alleged invention.[40] Even though the contract has been terminated so that the strict rule of estoppel does not apply,[41] nevertheless the fact that defendant was formerly an exclusive agent of plaintiff for the sale of the patented article,[42] or was a licensee to manufacture it,[43] is persuasive in determining the validity of the patent.

[§ 578] (5) Infringement—(a) In General. Unless it is not put in issue by the pleadings,[44] as where it is properly alleged in plaintiff's pleading and is admitted, either expressly or impliedly, in defendant's pleading,[45] plaintiff has the burden of proving infringement of the patent[46] by defend-

[a] Reason for rule.—"The mere fact that royalties have been paid demonstrates that those paying may have been unduly timid or sagacious. The action of business men and attorneys is not a substitute for the judgment of the court after a full hearing." Lektophone Corp. v. Brandes Products Corp., 16 F. (2d) 934, 935 [aff 20 F. 44. See cases infra this note; and infra note 45.

[a] Acts constituting infringement.—Denying infringement, without denying acts constituting infringement, is insufficient to raise an issue as to the latter. Rees v. Lombard, 21 F. (2d) 276 (considering an answer containing a denial, not of manufacturing and selling, but of manufacturing and selling in infringement of the patent).

45. See cases infra this note.

[a] Admissions.—(1) Infringement is admitted where it is alleged in the bill and not denied in the answer. Chase v. Fillebrown, 58 Fed. 374; Lane v. Soverign, 43 Fed. 890; Globe Nail Co. v. Superior Nail Co., 27 Fed. 454; Goodyear v. Day, 10 F. Cas. No. 5,566; Jordan v. Wallace, 13 F. Cas. No. 7,523, 5 Fish. Pat. Cas. 185, 8 Phila. (Pa.) 165. (2) The fact thus admitted must be accepted as established (Jones v. Morehead, 1 Wall. (U. S.) 155, 17 L. ed. 662; Lane v. Soverign, 43 Fed. 890; Jordan v. Wallace, 13 F. Cas. No. 7,523, 5 Fish. Pat. Cas. 185, 8 Phila. (Pa.) 165), (3) but the admission need go no further than its terms necessarily imply (Jones v. Morehead, supra). (4) Failure to deny alleged use of the patented invention is an admission thereof. Ely v. Monson, etc., Mfg. Co., 8 F. Cas. No. 4,431, 4 Fish. Pat. Cas. 64; Parker v. Bamker, 18 F. Cas. No. 10,725, 6 McLean 631. (5) Where the answer to a bill charging infringement admitted that defendant had, during the time alleged, made and used articles conforming to the claims of the patent, no further proof is required from complainant on the issue of infringement. Fox v. Knickerbocker Engraving Co., 165 Fed. 442, 91 CCA 386 [aff 158 Fed. 422]. See Wine R. Appliance Co. v. Enterprise R. Equipment Co., 25 F. (2d) 236, 238 (defendant's answer that it had made and sold the devices before suit commenced should not be construed as reasonably referring to a time before the patent issued; but it should be taken as an admission of that conduct which is infringement if the device is of infringing character"). (6) "To treat the answer of defendants who have been brought into court to meet a single unitary bill of complaint, as answers to two bills simply because the evidence develops two separate causes of action, and to construe one and the same averment as an efficient denial of infringement in one of the cases and an irrebuttable confession of infringement in the other, we would deem an abuse of the rules of equity pleading." Perry Side Bearing Co. v. Chicago R. Equipment Co., 178 Fed. 449, 452, 101 CCA 433 [certiorari den 216 U. S. 619 mem, 30 SCt 574 mem, 54 L. ed. 640 mem].

[b] Identity of function.—Where the patentee claims that the projections on defendant's tire tread perform the same functions, as vacuum cups, as are performed by plaintiff's patented tread, the burden is on the patentee to show that fact. Paynter v. Lee Tire, etc., Co., 282 Fed. 624.

[c] Evidence of possession.—(1) Evidence alone that defendant had an infringing device in his possession, without proof that he made, used, or sold it, does not make out a case of infringement (Sheffield Car Co. v. Buda Fdy., etc., Co., 177 Fed. 713 [aff 187 Fed. 847, 109 CCA 646]), (2) unless infringement is not explicitly denied in the answer (Gear v. Fitch, 10 F. Cas. No. 5,290, 3 Bann. & A. 573).

(5) Make a prima facie case of infringement. Toledo Metal Wheel Co. v. Foyer, 223 Fed. 350, 138 CCA 612. See Toronto Auer Light Co., Ltd. v. Colling, 31 Ont. 18 (evidence that articles were made according to plaintiff's process held sufficient to throw on defendant the onus of showing the contrary). (6) Show that a change in the product was colorable and for purposes of evasion only. Gordon v. Turco-Halvah Co., 247 Fed. 487, 159 CCA 541. (7) The testimony of one witness is sufficient to show infringement, where plaintiff waived an answer under oath. Bassick Mfg. Co. v. Ready Auto Supply Co., 22 F. (2d) 331. (8) Where defendant, in his proposal for a government contract, which was accepted, specified a machine which as described would in-ant.[47] Infringement is not made out by less than a preponderance of the evidence,[48] and ordinarily plaintiff is not required to prove it by more than a preponderance of the evidence,[49] but in a suit against a mere user the evidence should be convincing.[50] When the question of infringement is in doubt, the fact that the patent is a mere paper patent may turn the scale against infringement.[51] Also, where the patentee has delayed many years in bringing his contentions to trial, he is not entitled to have doubtful and difficult questions of fact as to infringement resolved in his favor.[52] Competent evidence bearing on the question of infringement is, of course, admissible.[53] The testimony of experts is admissible upon the question of infringement or identity where the question turns upon scientific principles or the meaning of technical terms,[54] but it is not necessarily to be accepted as controlling.[55]

Time and place. While the burden of proving infringement which rests on plaintiff[56] extends to the date or dates of infringement in so far as important,[57] yet the evidence receivable in this connection must be confined to that which is admissible under the pleadings.[58] Where infringement in the district wherein the suit is brought is alleged in the bill and denied in the answer, the issue of infringement is limited to infringement within the district;[59] but it is not error to receive evidence of infringement elsewhere, where, although plaintiff alleges infringement in the district, defendant denies infringement within the district or elsewhere;[60] and the case is tried in all respects as if the question were properly presented by the pleadings.[61] Evidence of a separate and wholly independent infringement in another district by one of two or more defendants jointly charged with infringement is irrelevant.[62]

Inferences and presumptions generally.[63] Identity of product raises a presumption of identity of process;[64] a sale at defendant's place of business by an employee is presumably a sale by defendant;[65] and the failure of defendant to testify may afford ground for an inference of controlling weight where infringement is otherwise in doubt and defendant is a former employee of plaintiff, familiar with the patented process in question and engaged in the same line of business.[66] The use of a device before the granting of a patent therefor raises no presumption fringe complainant's patent, the court is justified in finding infringement, in the absence of evidence from defendant showing what he did in fact furnish. International Curtis Mar. Turbine Co. v. William Cramp, etc., Ship, etc., Bldg. Co., 211 Fed. 124, 127 CCA 522 [certiorari den 234 U. S. 755 mem, 34 SCt 674 mem, 58 L. ed. 1578 mem].

(5) Where defendant, who admittedly made and sold an article, which infringed a patent, made an agreement with the patentee conceding the validity of the patent and agreeing to discontinue the manufacture and sale of the infringing article, the fact that he retained in his circular cuts apparently representing such article is not alone sufficient to establish subsequent infringement. of infringement afterward;[67] and no inference of infringement by the present defendant arises from a finding of infringement by a different defendant in another case.[68] When a composition responds to the tests of identity prescribed by the patent, it is prima facie an infringement;[69] but when it fails to respond to such tests the presumption is that there is no infringement.[70]

[§ 579] (b) Intent and Contributory Infringement. That it was easy for defendant to have disproved an intention to infringe, and that he did not do so, is not presumptive evidence that he entertained such intention.[71] Defendant is, however, presumed to have intended all the legal consequences of his acts.[72] In an action for contributory infringement, plaintiff has the burden of showing an intention on the part of defendant to aid another person in infringing the patent;[73] and while a person who sold an article capable of use only in a patented combination is presumed to have intended it should be so used,[74] yet where the article is also capable of other uses, an intent that it should be used in an infringing way must be affirmatively shown.[75] Articles or materials sold by defendant for the purpose of use by the purchaser in an infringing manner will be assumed to have been actually so used in the absence of proof to the contrary,[76] and the burden of showing the contrary rests upon defendant.[77]

[§ 580] (c) License or Excuse. While defendant has the burden of proving a license[78] or of explaining or justifying acts on his part which are apparently of an infringing character,[79] and plaintiff is entitled to a decree where he has proved the sale by defendant of a large number of articles embodying the patented invention and there is no proof that defendant was a licensee,[80] yet where a large number of articles are covered by a license and the article in question has long been in use, defendant is not required to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that it is covered by the license,[81] it being sufficient in such case to show the fact to the satisfaction of the court by a fair preponderance of credible evidence.[82] Parol evidence of a prior oral agreement is not admissible materially to alter or vary a written license which appears on its face to be comprehensive and complete.[83]

[§ 581] (d) Conformity to Another Patent. Where defendant has been making, selling, or using the machine or device in question under, and in accordance with, a patent subsequent to that of plaintiff's, such patent is admissible in evidence[84] and gives rise to a presumption of noninfringement,[85]

or at least a presumption of a substantial[86] or patentable[87] difference between the two structures; and the burden of overcoming the presumption rests upon plaintiff;[88] but the presumption is not conclusive;[89] and where the earlier patent was for a primary invention, another presumption that a later patent on the same subject is for a subordinate improvement or modification,[90] and hence does not preclude infringement of the earlier patent,[91] is at least as strong.[92]

Patent granted on copending application. The grant of another patent creates a presumption that a machine or device manufactured and sold by defendant thereunder does not infringe plaintiff's patent where the applications for the two patents were pending in the patent office at the same time;[93] but it is sometimes stated that the failure of the patent office to declare an interference between copending applications is of little, if any, evidential force on the question whether the device of one is an infringement of the other.[94]

[§ 582] (6) Profits and Damages—(a) In General. Except as to a few matters hereinafter discussed,[95] questions relating to evidence bearing upon damages and profits are considered in this portion of the article, regardless of whether such questions arise on an accounting before a master, an accounting before the court, or at the trial in an action at law before a court and jury. In so far as they are applicable,[96] the ordinary rules of evidence[97] govern in ascertaining profits and damages in a patent infringement case,[98] but no arbitrary rule should be allowed to prevail over the clear equities of the case.[99] At one time it was held that opinion evidence as to the amount of damage was not admissible,[1] but it was subsequently provided by statute that opinion or expert testimony may be received in the discretion of the court where the damages or profits are not susceptible of calculation and determination with reasonable certainty from the other evidence in the case.[2]

[§ 583] (b) Profits. Where plaintiff seeks to recover profits realized by defendant, he has the burden of showing that defendant has realized profits from the use or sale of the infringing article, device, or machine,[3] as well as the amount of such profits;[4] but where he has met this burden, defendant then has the burden of showing that part of the profits is due to other things,[5] and after defendant has satisfied this burden plaintiff has the burden of apportioning or separating the profits[6] by reliable and tangible proofs.[7] On the other hand, it is not incumbent upon plaintiff to apportion profits where it does not appear that any part of the profits was due to something other than the patented invention.[8] Defendant has the burden of showing expenses, depreciation, or like items which he claims should be deducted from receipts in ascertaining profits.[9] The fact that clear proofs are or ought to be within the control of defendant may justify inferences in favor of plaintiff which would not be justified if the proofs were controlled by him;[10] and where defendant fails or refuses to produce his books as ordered, the court is justified in acting on less definite evidence.[11]

Admissibility. Competent evidence bearing on the profits realized by defendant from the use or sale of the infringing article, machine, or device is admissible.[12] Where the infringement consisted in the use of a device or process, evidence of other means available to defendant is competent;[13] and where the infringement consisted in manufacture and sale, profits may be proved by evidence of the selling price and actual production costs[14] or by the testimony of experts.[15] The profits of other manufacturers are not relevant,[16] nor is the cost to such manufacturers,[17] except possibly for comparison in testing the claim of defendant.[18] However, the cost of manufacture to plaintiff is admissible where both he and defendant are large manufacturers of the same articles and are located in the same city.[19]

[§ 584] (c) Damages—aa. In General. Where plaintiff seeks to recover damages, he has the burden of proving facts which will show the amount of damages[20] or, in other words, the actual loss to invention, but was due in a substantial degree to unpatented parts or features. Dowagiac Mfg. Co. v. Minnesota Moline Plow Co., 235 U. S. 641, 35 SCt 221, 59 L. ed. 398 [rev 183 Fed. 314, 105 CCA 526].

[a] Apportionment impossible.—(1) It has been held that, where defendant by his failure to keep proper books of account, destruction of records, or otherwise has made it impossible for plaintiff to segregate or apportion the profits, the burden of apportionment or segregation rests upon defendant. Westinghouse Electric, etc., Co. v. Wagner Electric Mfg. Co., 281 Fed. 453 [rev 248 Fed. 508, and certiorari den 260 U. S. 744 mem, 43 SCt 165 mem, 67 L. ed. 827 mem]; Roth v. Harris, 197 Fed. 929. him.[21] Generally speaking, the loss to plaintiff from the infringement may be shown by any evidence which will best establish it.[22] However, evidence of settlements with other infringers is not admissible.[23]

[§ 585] bb. Profits Lost by Plaintiff. Where plaintiff claims that he lost sales on account of the infringement and seeks to recover damages measured by the profits which he would have made on such sales, he has the burden of proving that he was equipped to supply the articles which defendant sold,[24] that, but for the infringement, he would have made the sales which defendant made[25] and that he would have derived a profit therefrom.[26] That plaintiff, except for the infringement, would have made the sales which defendant made, cannot, by reason of its nature, be established by evidence as persuasive as that which it is possible to produce to prove that something has happened;[27] and all inferences and presumptions are not necessarily to be excluded;[28] but nevertheless plaintiff must establish the proposition with reasonable certainty.[29] Where plaintiff had the means and facilities to supply or furnish the articles which defendant sold, and plaintiff and defendant were the only competitors, it may be presumed that plaintiff, except for the infringement, would have made the sales which defendant made,[30] but this presumption is one of fact to be raised by the proofs,[31] rather than one of law,[32] and does not arise where there were several similar and noninfringing products in competition with plaintiff's.[33] It will not be presumed that plaintiff could have supplied the same customers,[34] or sold the same number of articles,[35] as defendant, at a higher price. Evidence of a conversation in which a purchaser from defendant stated why he did not purchase from plaintiff is admissible on behalf of plaintiff,[36] and after its admission it is error to refuse to permit defendant to take the testimony of such person.[37]

Diminution of profit on sales made. Before plaintiff may recover damages measured by a diminution of profit on sales made by him, it must be shown that such diminution was due to the infringement.[38]

[§ 586] cc. Royalties. The evidence admissible on the question of damages from infringement includes evidence of royalties paid by other persons for the use of the patented invention,[39] or evidence tending to show what would have been a reasonable royalty where that measure of damages is applicable,[40] as where there was no established royalty and no

(2) Where there is no dispute or doubt as to the prior art, construction of the claims of a patent is a matter of law for the court. Burroughs Adding Mach. Co. v. Rockford Milling Mach. Co., 292 Fed. 550. (3) Also, where there is no controversy on the facts as to the meaning of the claims or the disclosures of the prior art, the question of validity is for the court. Prepayment Car Sales Co. v. Orange County Tract. Co., 221 Fed. 939, 137 CCA 509. (4) "When a patent cause is tried before a jury and the testimony is closed, the court is not bound, under all circumstances, to send it to the jury on the question whether or not the combination of the patent discloses patentable invention. Although invention is generally spoken of as a question of fact, it does not necessarily follow that it must always be sent to the jury; other questions of fact arising in actions at law are frequently disposed of by the court, when upon the whole case the judge is satisfied that a verdict different from his own conclusion, if rendered, would have to be set aside." Prepayment Car Sales Co. v. Orange County Tract. Co., 214 Fed. 576, 577, 131 CCA 156. (5) If a patent is void on its face, the court may so instruct. Roberts v. Bennett, 135 Fed. 193, 69 CCA 533; Langdon v. De Groot, 14 F. Cas. No. 8,059, 1 Paine 203, 1 Robb Pat. Cas. 433. (6) Where the validity of a patent is to be determined and its claim construed by reference to prior patents, about the dates and authenticity of which there is no controversy, the trial judge may construe these documents without invading the province of the jury (Brothers v. Lidgerwood Mfg. Co., 223 Fed. 359, 138 CCA 460); (7) and where want of novelty in the patented invention in suit clearly appears from prior patents, there is no need of extrinsic evidence to explain the terms of the art or to apply description to the subject matter, and where either no extrinsic evidence is introduced or that which is introduced is not in conflict, the court may and should instruct the jury as to want of novelty, enter a nonsuit, or direct a verdict for defendant (Market St. Cable R. Co. v. Rowley, 155 U. S. 621, 15 SCt 224, 39 L. ed. 284; Bush v. Fox, 5 H. L. Cas. 707, 10 Reprint 1080; Booth v. Kennard, 2 H. & N. 84, 157 Reprint 35; Thomas v. Foxwell, 5 Jur. N. S. 37 [aff 6 Jur. N. S. 271]). (8) Where it appears very plainly, not only from a prior patent but from the patent in suit which shows on its face that the patentee characterized his invention as an "improvement," that the patentee is not a pioneer inventor, the court should so instruct the jury, and not submit the question to them for determination. Holt Mfg. Co. v. Best Mfg. Co., 172 Fed. 409, 97 CCA 107. (9) Where infringement is conclusively established by the evidence, it is not a jury question, and the court may properly direct a verdict for plaintiff on this issue. Sears, Roebuck & Co. v. Pearce, 253 Fed. 960, 165 CCA 402. (10) In a plain case the court may determine infringement by comparing the alleged infringing article or device and the patent. Automatic Pencil Sharpener Co. v. Kibbe, 10 Fed. 669, 20 Blatchf. 353. (11) The court may properly specify the amount which the jury are required to find if any liability exists, where the amount of damages is fixed and definite and there is no dispute or conflict in testimony as to it. ment,[54] or the identity of the alleged infringing device with the patented device,[55] and the amount of damages,[56] are to be determined by the jury under proper instructions by the court as to the law,[57] including a definition of the scope and meaning of the patent.[58]

[§ 588] b. In Suits in Equity—(1) In General. Two patent infringement cases may be consolidated where they involve the same patent and persons or corporations having the same interests,[59] even though the parties are not exactly identical.[60] A separate hearing of the defense of the nonliability of one defendant for the acts of another will not be granted.[61]

[§ 589] (2) Taking and Reception of Evidence. Ordinarily, under the present equity rules,[62] the testimony in a patent infringement case should be taken,[63] and the trial should be had,[64] in open court, and the taking of depositions or oral testimony out of court,[65] or a reference to a master,[66] save in matters of account,[67] should be exceptional; but the congested condition of the court calendar may render it proper to refer the case to a master to take and hear the evidence.[68] Defendant should complete his evidence before the taking of plaintiff's evidence in rebuttal.[69] Plaintiff is entitled as a matter of right to introduce evidence in rebuttal,[70] but not after the argument has commenced.[71] While the evidence on rebuttal should be limited to that which is strictly such,[72] nevertheless an irregularity in introducing in rebuttal evidence which should have been given in chief may be disregarded where the irregularity does not harm or prejudice anyone.[73] After the case has been submitted upon certain evidence, additional evidence will not be received,[74] unless the court exercises its discretion to reopen the case or grant a rehearing upon a proper showing.[75] To be available, objections to evidence should be distinctly made when the evidence is taken.[76] The court will not, on plaintiff's motion, compel defendant to file an exhibit in a form different from that already filed by him.[77]

will not pass upon questions which are moot or the determination of which is not necessary to a decision of the actual controversy.[79] Issues of fact are to be determined on the evidence;[80] invention[81] and infringement[82] are ordinarily questions of fact; and where the question of infringement cannot be satisfactorily solved unless the court is informed of the state of the art, the court should not dispose of the case on mere inspection of an alleged infringing exhibit;[83] but in a plain case not requiring extrinsic evidence the court may determine the question of infringement merely by inspection and comparison of plaintiff's patent and defendant's device or design,[84] or, where defendant's article is manufactured under, and in accordance with, a later patent, by an inspection and comparison of the two patents,[85] and in such case the question of infringement is one of law.[86] The construction placed on the claims of a patent by the court on granting a preliminary injunction should be followed at the final hearing, where there has been no substantial change in the cause so far as it relates to the question of construction.[87] The findings made must not be inconsistent;[88] and where the suit is for the infringement of two or more patents, the validity of each must be determined separately.[89] Where the case has been referred to a master, at least a presumptive verity attaches to his findings.[90]

Submission of issues to jury.[91] In case of doubt,[92] the court may, in its discretion, award an issue to be tried by a jury;[93] but it will not grant an issue to be tried by a jury merely because requested to do so by a party;[94] and in the absence of special circumstances the issues will be tried before the court rather than before a jury.[95]

[§ 591] 11. Judgment or Decree and Recovery or Relief[96]—a. In General. In an action at law for infringement of a patent the recovery is limited to the actual loss or damage sustained by plaintiff from the infringement,[97] and such increased damages as, under statutory authority, the court may and does award.[98] In a suit in equity the decree should not go beyond the pleadings,[99] and the issues tried, heard, and considered by the court;[1] but upon proper pleadings[2] and proof[3] the decree may grant an injunction against future infringement,[4] and award profits and damages for past infringement,[5] after a proper accounting thereof.[6] Also, where infringing

Goldsmith Metal Lath Co., v. Truscon Steel Co., 29 F. (2d) 658. (3) "Among several claims, the most general, which covers the alleged infringements, alone is necessary to a decision of the controversy; the rest thereafter necessarily present moot issues. If the defendant infringes the more general, a fortiori he infringes the particular." Electrical Engineers' Equipment Co. v. Champion Switch Co., 23 F. (2d) 600, 604. But see Mershon v. Bay City Box, etc., Co., 189 Fed. 741 (where certain claims are found valid and infringed, it is proper to recite in the decree a finding that another claim is invalid). (4) Where it is found that there is no infringement, the court will not pass upon the question of validity. Wahl v. N. E. Norstrom Electric Mfg. Co., 19 F. (2d) 544 [aff 27 F. (2d) 635]; Warren Bros. Co. v. Thompson, 282 Fed. 326 [aff 293 Fed. 745]; Ward v. Finley Method Co., 259 Fed. 869; Saxe v. Hammond, 21 F. Cas. No. 12,411, 1 Bann. & A. 629, Holmes 456. (5) By virtue of the principles of estoppel (see supra § 286), (6) the question of validity cannot arise in a suit by an assignee against the assignor, and where, in such suit, the prior art is not shown, the court will not attempt to determine the place therein occupied by the invention in suit, but will merely construe the claims on their face to such an extent as is sufficient to dispose of the issue of infringement (Piano Motors Corp. v. Motor Player Corp., 282 Fed. 435). (7) An issue of unfair competition will not be passed upon where the evidence bearing thereon is meager and a decree on the issue of infringement found in plaintiff's favor will afford him ample relief (Tweedie v. Royal Co., 267 Fed. 224 [rev on other grounds 276 Fed. 351]), (8) or where the patent is held to be void and there is an absence of diversity of citizenship of the parties (Schiebel Toy, etc., Co. v. articles, devices, or machines are in the possession or under the control of defendant, a court of equity may order him to deliver them to plaintiff to be destroyed,[7] but it is within the discretion of the court to make or not to make such an order,[8] and in the United States it will be made only under exceptional circumstances.[9] During the pendency of the suit discovery may be had,[10] a temporary injunction may be granted,[11] and articles in the possession or under the control of defendant and prima facie shown to be of an infringing character may be impounded until a final decree is rendered.[12] A pro forma decree by the trial court is not favored.[13]

Assignment of patent in suit,[14] but not another patent,[15] from one party to the other may be decreed when necessary to do full and complete equity between the parties.

Final or interlocutory decree. Where the merits of a sufficient bill for infringement of a patent have been established by proof, plaintiff is entitled to an interlocutory decree.[16-17] While a decree adjudging the patent to be valid and infringed, granting a permanent injunction, and directing an accounting of profits and damages, is interlocutory[18] in a technical sense[19] and from the standpoint of time,[20] yet it is final in its essence as to all matters of substance,[21] save the amount to be recovered,[22] and it is deemed to be final within the meaning of a statute relating to the fees of the clerk of court in connection with an appeal.[23] A decree dismissing a bill of revivor as to injunction, damages, and treble damages, but retaining it as to profits, is an interlocutory, rather than a final, decree.[24]

[§ 592] b. Discovery[25]—(1) In General. In a suit for infringement of a patent interrogatories are liberally allowed[26] in favor of either party,[27] and proper interrogatories must be answered by the party to whom they are propounded,[28] even though there is a prayer for treble damages.[29] However, notwithstanding this liberal rule,[30] there are limits to the scope of interrogatories which a party may propound to his opponent,[31] and a party is not obliged to answer interrogatories calling for the names of his witnesses[32] or of the persons from whom he has obtained information;[33] a mere opinion,[34] argument,[35] comparison,[36] legal conclusion,[37] or interpretation or construction of a patent;[38] an explanation amounting to secondary evidence of the meaning of plans;[39] knowledge of attempts by other persons to use a particular patented method;[40] or facts which are within the knowledge of the party propounding the interrogatories,[41] or are not material[42] or directly pertinent to the issues.[43] Also, interrogatories by defendant will be disallowed where they cover matters comprehended in a motion for a bill of particulars which has been granted;[44] and where plaintiff has pointed out the parts of defendant's machine which he claims to be an infringement, he cannot be compelled to point out the elements in his own claim which he charges are infringed.[45] Sometimes objections to interrogatories are sustained on the ground that the information sought thereby may be procured otherwise with ease,[46] as by inspection[47] or by a motion and rule upon the opposite party.[48] While discovery or interrogatories may be allowed before the patent has been sustained,[49] at least where the validity of the patent is not in issue,[50] discovery, by interrogatories or otherwise, as to details of defendant's business bearing only upon the amount of damages or profits should not be allowed until plaintiff, by prevailing upon the issues, establishes his right to damages or profits.[51]

Trade secret or process. Where an interrogatory is otherwise proper, a refusal to answer it cannot be justified upon the ground that it involves a disclosure of a trade secret or a secret process,[52] but the courts will not allow the remedy of discovery to be used oppressively to compel disclosure of a secret process,[53] and in one jurisdiction discovery of a secret process cannot be had until the validity of the patent is established.[54]

Employing language of claim. While an interrogatory need not,[55] and ordinarily should not,[56] be framed in the language of the claims of the patent, yet where it is otherwise proper, both as to subject matter and language, the fact that it employs the language of the claims is not fatal.[57]

Sealing answer. It is stated generally that an order requiring answers to interrogatories to be sealed and deposited with the clerk of court until both parties have committed themselves as to the facts should be made only with the consent of the parties.[58] However, in order to safeguard the rights of both parties,[59] answers disclosing dates should be sealed and deposited with the clerk of court,[60] and an order to this effect may be made upon an ex parte request.[61]

[§ 593] (2) Production or Inspection of Writings or Physical Objects. As in the case of interrogatories,[62] inspection is liberally allowed in a suit for infringement of a patent,[63] and, where otherwise proper, it will not be denied because of an objection that it will result in a disclosure of a secret process;[64] but sometimes an inspection involving a disclosure of secrets is denied under the circumstances of the particular case,[65] or conditions are attached to the allowance or making of the inspection.[66] A party may be required to produce or furnish drawings, blue prints, or models of devices referred to in the pleadings and involved in the litigation;[67] and, generally speaking, defendant may be ordered to permit inspection of his factory and machines;[68] but an inspection of an alleged infringing machine in defendant's plant or factory will not be allowed upon mere suspicion of infringement.[69] While, in a proper case, defendant may be compelled to produce certain books of account,[70] or pertinent records and documents,[71] complainant cannot compel production of all books of a big concern,[72] but must specify those wanted.[73] Defendant may have discovery of documents in plaintiff's possession in so far as they are relevant to the issues in the case.[74]

[§ 594] c. Injunction[75]—(1) In General. The several federal courts vested with jurisdiction of cases arising under the patent laws[76] are given power by statute to grant injunctions, according to the course and principles of courts of equity, to prevent the violation of any right secured by a patent,[77] and this power is entirely independent of the award of any other relief in the same suit,[78] although the converse is not true, or, in other words, other relief may ordinarily be sought in a court of equity only as incidental to the right to an injunction at the time of instituting the suit.[79] Injunctions are granted to preserve property rights in patents upon the same principle that they are granted to preserve other property rights.[80] An injunction may be granted to prevent the future infringement of a patent[81] where such infringement is intended or threatened,[82] not only where defendant has,[83] but even where he has not,[84] previously infringed the patent; and an injunction may be granted, although the patentee has never used the invention himself,[85] a license contract is alleged,[86] or defendant acted under a contract with his codefendant, to which complainant was not a party, purporting to grant immunity from the infringement.[87] On the other hand an injunction against infringement will not be granted where infringement is not actually threatened or reasonably apprehended,[88] nor will it be granted where the patent covers a gambling device,[89] or plaintiff is guilty of deception.[90] A contributory infringer may be enjoined,[91] as may also a mere user,[92] but a mere user will be enjoined only in a clear case,[93] and an injunction will not as readily be granted against him as against a maker or seller of the patented invention.[94]

Before issuance of patent, no injunction against infringement thereof can be granted.[95]

After defendant has infringed, an injunction against further infringement may be granted[96] where further infringement is threatened[97] or probable,[98] or the prior infringement was purposeful[99] and inexcusable,[1] and committed under circumstances calculated to arouse just apprehension that it would be persisted in,[2] although not where the prior infringement consisted of a few isolated acts committed in good faith.[3] Even though defendant has ceased to infringe, an injunction may be granted[4] where a renewal of infringement is actually or in effect threatened or reasonably apprehended;[5] but not otherwise.[6] Indeed the facts that defendant has ceased to infringe and promised not to infringe in the future do not necessarily prevent the issuance of an injunction;[7] but an injunction will be refused where, under all the circumstances, including such [a] Rule applied.—(1) Where defendant, a corporation, sold its plant, but retained another patent under which prior alleged infringements had been practiced and justified, it did not give up its right to proceed under that patent or deny its intention to do so; it denied complainant's right and asserted a countervailing right both in the suit in question and in another action. Co., 281 Fed. 864 (an injunction will be denied where a different type of machine is now being used, and it is reasonably certain that no infringement has been intended for a long time, or is now contemplated).

[a] Circumstances in addition to lack of threats.—An injunction will be refused where it appears not only that defendnat has ceased to infringe and does not threaten to infringe, but also that: (1) He does not intend to again infringe, which fact is known to complainant. Chadeloid Chemical Co. v. Johnson, 203 Fed. 993, 122 CCA 293. cessation and promise, it is clear that no further infringement is contemplated.[8]

Exception of governmental use. In granting an injunction against an infringer of a patent the court may,[9] but need not,[10] write into the injunction an express exception of the making or use of the patented article by or for the government.

Against plaintiff.[11] In an equitable suit against a manufacturer for infringement of a patent, the court will, upon application, restrain complainant, until the determination of the present suit, from instituting or prosecuting a multiplicity of oppressive and vexatious suits against widely scattered customers of defendant.[12] The court is without authority to enjoin plaintiff from refusing to grant a license to defendant.[13]

[§ 595] (2) After, or Shortly Prior to, Expiration of Patent. Although jurisdiction of a bill filed shortly before the expiration of a patent may exist,[14] it does not follow that an injunction should or must issue.[15] Ordinarily a final,[16] although not a preliminary,[17] injunction will be granted where the patent is about to expire; but no injunction will be granted after the expiration of the patent,[18] nor will an injunction granted before the expiration of the patent be so construed as to continue beyond the term of the patent,[19] unless a proper case is presented for enjoining the sale or use of infringing articles made before, and in the possession of defendant at, the expiration of the patent.[20]

[§ 596] (3) Preliminary Injunction—(a) Discretion of Court. While the granting or refusing of a preliminary injunction in an equitable suit for infringement of a patent rests within the sound[21] dis-

Second, if it should ever transpire in the taking of evidence as to damages, that a part of the damage claimed is by reason of the making of the article for the government, or the use of the article for the government, the court can make provision for, and grant ample protection to the infringer as to, that part of the damages, and can remit so much of the claim for damages as is for such making or use, to the Court of Claims for determination." cretion of the trial court,[22] nevertheless the discretion of the court in this respect is a judicial discretion,[23] rather than a mere personal whim,[24] and it does not extend to a refusal to apply well-settled principles to a conceded or indisputable state of facts.[25] The general principles which control the discretion of the court in granting or refusing preliminary injunctions in equity suits generally[26] apply in suits for infringement of patents.[27]

[§ 597] (b) Grounds for Granting or Denying; Matters Considered—aa. In General. In a suit in equity for infringement of a patent, a preliminary injunction may be granted[28] or refused[29] according to the showing made[30] and the principles governing the court in determining and disposing of the motion for the injunction.[31] To be entitled to a preliminary injunction, complainant must establish a prima facie case[32] free from reasonable doubt[33] as to every matter necessary for him to establish;[34] the right to,[35] and necessity,[36] or a satisfactory reason,[37] for the injunction must be clearly shown. On a motion for a preliminary injunction, the court will consider all pertinent facts which are clearly shown,[38] or it will interpret a written instrument or document properly before it[39] where the right to an injunction depends upon such interpretation alone and not upon any controverted or doubtful facts;[40] but it will not attempt to decide doubtful questions[41] or disputed and difficult questions of law or fact;[42] and it will refuse to grant an injunction in case of doubt[43] as to the validity[44] or infringement[45] of the patent. It is ground to deny a preliminary injunction that there has been laches on the part of plaintiff;[46] that the patent is about to expire;[47] that complainant takes inconsistent positions as to a license being in force;[48] or that defendant has a later patent under which he is working;[49] and sometimes a preliminary injunction is denied on the ground, among others, that a final hearing can soon be had.[50] A preliminary injunction will be withheld where it is apparently sought for the purpose of obtaining an undue advantage,[51] creating mischief,[52] or coercing a compromise;[53] but the fact that, after the court has expressed an opinion that plaintiff is entitled to a preliminary injunction, another person or corporation attempts to license defendant to do the act which the court has held that plaintiff is entitled to have enjoined, does not furnish sufficient ground for withholding the injunction.[54] In a suit by an assignee against a stranger to the assignment, defendant is not in a position to attack the validity of the assignment on the hearing of a motion for a preliminary injunction.[55]

[§ 598] bb. the patent has neither been adjudicated nor acquiesced in by the public, a preliminary injunction will ordinarily be refused;[58] but it may be granted where the validity of the patent is clear,[59] or is not questioned[60] or assailed by any evidence,[61] or defendant is estopped to deny it,[62] or has intentionally infringed[63] or, since the termination of a license, has been marking the articles sold by him as made under the patent.[64]

Presumption of validity of patent arising from its issuance[65] is not alone sufficient to warrant the granting of a preliminary injunction,[66] unless no prior patent or publication, and no statement as to the prior state of the art is submitted;[67] but the presumption may be so strongly buttressed on the initial showing that it would be an injustice to refuse an injunction.[68]

[§ 599] (bb) Public Acquiescence. A long continued public acquiescence in the claims of the patentee may justify the acceptance of the patent as valid for the purpose of a preliminary injunction[69] without an adjudication of validity;[70] but, to come within the rule, acquiescence must be clearly shown.[71] What constitutes acquiescence depends on the facts of each particular case.[72]

[§ 600] (cc) Prior Adjudication—aaa. Necessity. While the court, in its discretion,[73] may properly refuse to grant a preliminary injunction against the infringement of a patent where the validity of the patent has not been previously adjudicated,[74] especially where the patent is new or of recent date,[75] nevertheless a prior adjudication sustaining the patent is not an absolute prerequisite to an injunction,[76] and, notwithstanding the lack of such a prior adjudication, a preliminary injunction may be granted where the validity of the patent is clear[77] or has been acquiesced in for a long time by the public,[78] or there has been actual, palpable, and inexcusable fraud on the part of defendant.[79]

[§ 601] bbb. Effect[80]—(aaa) In General. A preliminary injunction will be refused where a prior adjudication was against the patent.[81] Conversely, a preliminary injunction will ordinarily be granted where the patent has been previously sustained either at law or in equity,[82] and a sufficient showing of infringement is made,[83] or, in other words, while a prior adjudication of the validity of a patent leaves open the question of infringement,[84] yet, subject to the exceptions hereinafter mentioned,[85] where such a prior adjudication has been made, the court, in determining and disposing of a motion for a preliminary injunction, will consider only the question of infringement[86] and dispose of the matter of validity by following the prior adjudication,[87] assuming[88] or recognizing[89] the validity of the patent, or sustaining the patent, so far as the motion is concerned,[90] and leaving the question of its validity to be determined upon final hearing.[91] Notwithstanding the introduction of new evidence, a preliminary injunction may be granted upon the strength of a prior adjudication,[92] unless the new evidence is such that, if presented in the former case, it would probably have resulted in a different decision;[93] and even though the parties are different, the prior adjudication has great weight.[94] Such prior adjudication, however, unless made by the United States supreme court or the circuit court of appeals[95] of the same circuit,[96] is not controlling upon the judgment of the court[97] but is merely persua-

[a] New evidence must be clear and convincing to warrant what is substantially a reversal of a prior adjudication. Consolidated Fastener Co. v. Hays, 100 Fed. 984, 41 CCA 142.

[b] Another patent not considered (1) in a prior suit adjudging the patent in question to be valid is sufficient justification for the court, in the exercise of its discretion, to refuse a preliminary injunction. Waterbury Buckle Co. v. G. E. Prentice Mfg. Co., 286 Fed. 358; Rousso v. Barber, 276 Fed. 552 [certiorari den 257 U. S. 658 mem, 42 SCt 185 mem, 66 L. ed. 421 mem]. Compare Wayne Mfg. Co. v. Coffield Motor Washer Co., 209 Fed. 614, 126 CCA 608 (when a patent has been sustained on a final hearing, the right thus secured to have its validity accepted on a motion for a preliminary injunction in another suit, except in rare cases, cannot be destroyed by new citations of patents from the patent office). (2) However, while the court will not refuse to consider new references, it is fair that it "should require of them that they should throw a much larger measure of doubt upon the invention than if no suit has been tried and the art had not been already searched for relevant anticipations." Westinghouse Electric, etc., Co. v. Independent Wireless Tel. Co., 300 Fed. 748, 752.

sive;[98] and it will not be followed where the points involved in the present case were not fairly in issue and decided in the former case,[99] there was collusion,[1] or the adjudication was made by consent or stipulation or without contest.[2] Whether judgment on the original patent shall be followed on a reissue depends on the circumstances.[3]

Conflicting adjudication. It is variously stated that, where there are conflicting prior adjudications as to the validity of a patent, a preliminary injunction will be refused,[4] the best considered decision will be followed,[5-6] or the decision in the same circuit will control.[7]

[§ 602] (bbb) Nature and Status of Proceedings in Prior Case. A ruling on an interlocutory motion may be followed.[8] Where an appeal or writ of error is pending, an adjudication is not binding;[9] and it is proper to refuse a preliminary injunction where defendant states a purpose to apply to the circuit court of appeals for leave to file a bill of review, in order to have a former decree of validity opened and new evidence attacking the validity of the patent heard.[10] A decision in interference proceedings in the patent office is not a controlling adjudication,[11] but it may be sufficient between the parties,[12] so far as priority of invention is concerned.[13]

[§ 603] cc. Infringement. Before a preliminary injunction against infringement of a patent will be granted, infringement must be shown[14] clearly[15] and convincingly;[16] in case of doubt as to infringement, an injunction will be refused.[17] Unless the prior action was one at law,[18] the court, on determining a motion for a preliminary injunction, will follow a prior adjudication of infringement[19] or non-infringement[20] where the machines or devices involved in the two suits are the same or substantially the same; but a preliminary injunction will not be denied merely because of defendant's pending application asking another court's advice as to whether or not a certain construction can be considered an infringement.[21]

[§ 604] dd. Injury or Inconvenience. A preliminary injunction against infringement of a patent is granted only to prevent irreparable injury to plaintiff,[22] and ordinarily it may be refused where the granting thereof would work great injury to defendant and its refusal would injure plaintiff in a much less degree,[23] but it will not be refused for hardship on defendant where the infringement is willful,[24] or where the validity of the patent is fully established and its infringement is clear.[25] An injunction will not be refused because of mere inconvenience to the public,[26] nor is it a ground for denying an injunction that it may be used for advertising purposes to injure defendant,[27] but where there are other grounds for denying an injunction, the possibility of advertising the injunction may be accorded weight.[28]

[§ 605] ee. Financial Responsibility of Defendant.[29] In connection with other matters,[30] such as a lack of prior adjudication of,[31] or of other matters

Co., 196 Fed. 892, 116 CCA 454 (although infringement is doubtful, yet the court may properly preserve the status quo by granting an injunction where irreparable injury will result to plaintiff if his motion for an injunction is denied and the final decision is in his favor, and the loss and inconvenience to defendant, if the injunction is issued, will be comparatively small and insignificant).

[a] Infringement must be shown beyond doubt.—Brookfield v. Elmer Glassworks, 132 Fed. 312; Welsbach Light Co. v. Cosmopolitan Incandescent Gaslight Co., 100 Fed. 648 [aff 104 Fed. 83, 43 CCA 418]; Consolidated Fastener Co. v. American Fastener Co., 94 Fed. 523; American Nicholson Pavement Co. v. Elizabeth, 1 F. Cas. No. 312, 4 Fish. Pat. Cas. 189; Parker v. Sears, 18 F. Cas. No. 10,748, 1 Fish. Pat. Cas. 93.

[b] Degree of doubt.—A preliminary injunction against infringement of a patent will not be granted where there is doubt as to infringement and such doubt is: (1) Substantial. Valvona-Marchiony Co. v. Silverstein, 207 Fed. 374. (2) Considerable. Layne v. Getty, 222 Fed. 917, 138 CCA 397. (3) Grave. Western Tel. Mfg. Co. v. Swedish-American Tel. Co., 163 Fed. 308 [aff 194 Fed. 104, 114 CCA 182]. (4) Serious. Scott v. Lazell, 169 Fed. 661. (5) It is held that the court may, in its discretion, properly refuse to grant a preliminary injunction where it is reasonably in doubt as to whether defendant's device infringes plaintiff's patent. Rousso v. Detroit First Nat. Bank, 287 Fed. 273 [certiorari den 262 U. S. 754 mem, 43 SCt 702 mem, 67 L. ed. 1216 mem]. (6) But it is also held that it is not imperative that infringement be shown beyond a reasonable doubt, and that a preliminary injunction may be granted where there is a fair probability that infringement exists. Crescent Specialty Co. v. National Fireworks Distributing Co., 219 Fed. 130, 135 CCA 28.

[c] Infringement questionable.—It is variously stated that (1) an injunction pendente lite should not be granted in a patent suit except where the patent is infringed beyond question (Blancard v. Simson, 22 F. (2d) 498), (2) or that an injunction will not be granted where there is any fair (Standard Plunger El. Co. v. Stokes, 196 Fed. 47 [aff 200 Fed. 770, 119 CCA 292]) (3) or serious (Johns-Pratt Co. v. Sachs Co., 255 Fed. 129) question as to infringement.

[a] Consent decrees.—Where certain members of a family by consent decrees had admitted infringement of patents in suit, if the evidence established that they persisted in infringement in which three other members of the family sued for infringement were employed in capacities directly connected with the infringement, it devolved upon the members sued to show rather definitely that they were ignorant of, or not involved in, the wrongdoings of their relatives in order to avoid the granting of a preliminary injunction. [a] "The court knows of no reason why it should permit the defendant to continue to infringe merely in order that it may or may not hereafter prosecute an application in another court, asking that court to advise it whether it may in the future commit the acts actually found in this court to amount to infringement. Comity does not require such action, nor is there any reason why this court should not proceed to grant the relief to which the plaintiff is entitled. showing,[32] the validity of the patent, the likelihood of great harm, injury or damage resulting to defendant from an injunction,[33] or doubt as to whether a showing sufficient to warrant an injunction has been made,[34] the fact that defendant is financially responsible and apparently able to answer to complainant for money damages in case the patent is adjudged valid and infringed may influence the court to deny a motion for a preliminary injunction; but this fact alone will not preclude the granting of a preliminary injunction where there is no substantial doubt as to infringement of a valid patent[35] and there is no proof of any definite and established royalty or license fee.[36] Likewise, in connection with other matters, an insufficient showing of defendant's responsibility to answer for the damages which plaintiff may suffer may influence the court to grant a preliminary injunction;[37] and defendant's insolvency is considered a sufficient showing of irreparable injury to complainant if infringement is not prevented by injunction.[38]

[§ 606] (c) Application and Proceedings Thereon. In order to obtain a preliminary injunction against infringement of a patent, the motion or other application therefor must be supported by the affidavits of complainant and others to all facts necessary to establish his right which are not shown in the bill,[39] and documents referred to should be produced.[40] Defendant may file counter affidavits,[41] and complainant may file rebutting affidavits,[42] but defendant is not entitled to file further affidavits in reply to complainant's rebutting affidavits.[43] A temporary restraining order, to be in force until the motion is decided, may be granted without previous notice in a case of exigency.[44]

[§ 607] (d) Scope, Terms, and Conditions.[45] In disposing of a motion for an injunction pendente lite, the court will make such order as the equities of the case demand.[46] Where defendant is a corporation, it may be restrained from paying dividends,[47] but it should not be enjoined from continuing the payment of royalties to a foreign company for the use of patents owned by that company.[48] The terms and conditions to be imposed in disposing of the motion rest in the sound discretion of the court[49] and depend upon the special circumstances of the case.[50] A bond from complainant may be required as a condition of granting a preliminary injunction.[51]

[a] Amount and conditions.—(1) "If such bond is required, its conditions, since they are dependent on no statute, should be carefully fixed, so that the security which is given to defendant shall be real and not merely colorable." Vrooman v. Burdick, 222 Fed. 900, 901, 138 CCA 380. Whether such bond shall be required depends upon the circumstances.[52]

Modification. A preliminary injunction against infringement of the patent may[54] and should[55] be modified where a proper case for modification is presented.

Dissolution. In the exercise of its sound discretion,[56] and after due consideration of the grounds urged[57] and showing made,[58] the trial court may grant[59] or deny[60] a motion to dissolve a preliminary injunction against infringement of a patent.

[§ 609] (4) Permanent Injunction.[61] The right to a permanent injunction ordinarily exists where judgment is in favor of complainant[62] but there may be special circumstances which will prevent its issuance,[63] as where it is not necessary and its allow-issue of the injunction, is not a real protection. The damages in such a case are likely to be serious and genuine, but largely or wholly incapable of proof. In such case the condition should be to pay a fixed sum which can fairly be estimated as the value of the business which is destroyed." Commercial Acetylene Co. v. Acme Acetylene Appliance Co., 188 Fed. 89, 91 [aff 192 Fed. 321, 112 CCA 573].

Vrooman v. Burdick, 222 Fed. 900, 901, 138 CCA 380.

[b] Where new questions are raised, and the court on final hearing, or the court of appeals, may take a view different from that entertained on the hearing of the motion for the preliminary injunction, complainant should give security. Commercial Acetylene Co. v. Acme Acetylene Co., 188 Fed. 89 [aff 192 Fed. 321, 112 CCA 573].

[a] Giving of security by defendant.—Kryptok Co. v. Harris, 216 Fed. 642.

[b] Use of record in another case.—Where defendant desires a suspension of the preliminary injunction in order to profit by any pending litigation in another circuit, the suspension may be granted on condition that plaintiff may, in the instant case, use the record in the other case in his own behalf, if he shall elect to do so. General Electric Co. v. Brite-Lite Lamp Co., 290 Fed. 967.

[a] Thus it is held in particular cases that an injunction should be modified so as to: (1) Put a stop to a practice which is a mere evasion of the injunction. Lovell-McConnell Mfg. Co. v. International Auto. League, 202 Fed. 219, 120 CCA 169. (2) Strike out a clause or provision which is likely to cause confusion. Westinghouse Electric, etc., Co. v. [b] Wrongful use by complainant of preliminary injunction by sending notices of the same to the trade and to customers of defendant, together with letters which are misleading as to its scope and effect, and calculated to injure defendant's legitimate business, affords ground for dissolution of the injunction. Meyers v. Skinner, 186 Fed. 347.

[c] Assignment of patent by complainant, after the preliminary injunction has been granted, is not ground for dissolution of the injunction. Thompson v. Barry, 23 F. Cas. No. 13,942.

[d] Nonjoinder of party.—Where it is not clear that the suit for infringement is not well brought in plaintiff's name alone, a motion to dissolve the injunction because of the nonjoinder of a party will be denied. Bassett v. Malone, 11 Fed. 801.

[e] Objection to form or signature of papers.—Where the objection relates not to the merits, but to the technical form or signature of papers connected with the letters patent, and the doubts arise from acts of public officers, and not any neglect or wrong of the patentee, the injunction should not be dissolved. Woodworth v. Hall, 30 F. Cas. No. 18,017, 2 Robb Pat. Cas. 517, 1 Woodb. & M. 389.

58. See cases infra this note.

[a] Answers and proofs.—(1) A motion to dissolve the injunction will be denied unless defendant's proofs overcome the equity of the bill and the evidence supporting it. Sparkman v. Higgins, 22 F. Cas. No. 13,208, 1 Blatchf. 205, Fish. Pat. R. 110. (2) An injunction will not be dissolved, as a matter of course, on the coming in of the answer denying the equity of the bill, if complainant has adduced auxiliary evidence of his right. Orr v. Littlefield, 18 F. Cas. No. 10,590, 2 Robb Pat. Cas. 323, 1 Woodb. & M. 13; Orr v. Merrill, 18 F. Cas. No. 10,591, 2 Robb Pat. Cas. 331, 1 Woodb. & M. 376. (3) Also, an injunction will not be dissolved on affidavits of prior use or invention where the answer does not contain averments sufficient to admit proof thereof on the final hearing. Union Paper-Bag Mach. Co. v. Newell, 24 F. Cas. No. 14,389, 1 Bann. & A. 113, 11 Blatchf. 549. (4) On the other hand, when an answer denying the validity of the patent is filed, and evidence supporting the answer, prima facie, is offered, the injunction will be dissolved, unless the other side files counter evidence sustaining it. Woodworth v. Rogers, 30 F. Cas. No. 18,018, 2 Robb Pat. Cas. 625, 3 Woodb. & M. 135. (5) In order to obtain a dissolution of the injunction, defendant must offer new and material evidence, and not merely evidence which has been heard, or should have been offered or produced before. ance would be injurious to the public.[64] Where the patent is recent, the specification obscure, and the proof of infringement meager and unsatisfactory, the court will not grant an injunction, even upon a final hearing.[65] While a perpetual injunction ordered by an interlocutory decree, rendered after a full hearing on the merits, may be suspended by the court until the final decree is rendered,[66] and it is proper to provide for a stay upon the giving of a bond to secure to plaintiff the damages and profits which he may finally recover,[67] the court will not ordinarily grant a stay or suspension,[68] and before doing so it should look carefully to all the facts and circumstances involved.[69] After an interlocutory decree ordering the issuance of an injunction has been entered, and before it is vacated or a final decree is rendered, it is improper to order the issuance of another injunction in substantially the same terms as the prior order.[70]

[§ 610] (5) Supplemental Injunction. Where, after an interlocutory decree, defendant places a new device or apparatus upon the market and there is a substantial dispute as to whether the new structure is an infringement of plaintiff's patent, it is proper practice to present the question to the court by a motion for a supplemental decree extending the injunction to the new structure;[71] but a motion to extend an injunction so as to include another device will be denied where the device was in the hands of plaintiff and disregarded by him prior to the entry of the interlocutory decree,[72] or where the asserted new infringement does not plainly render a new action and another trial an expensive futility.[73] Like the granting or refusing of preliminary injunctive relief,[74] the granting or refusing of supplemental injunctive relief is a matter of discretion,[75] but a supplemental injunction differs from a preliminary injunction in that it is not followed by a trial.[76]

[§ 611] (6) Violation and Punishment[77]—(a) In General. The violation of an injunction by defendant in a suit for infringement of a patent constitutes a contempt[78] for which he may be fined[79] in appropriate proceedings[80] and upon proper pleadings[81] and evidence.[82] To authorize punishment for contempt, the evidence of a breach of the injunction must be clear,[83] and, ordinarily, where violation is doubtful, an adjudication of, or punishment for, contempt is not warranted,[84] and the court will remit the party to his right to file a supplemental bill in the original suit,[85] or to institute a new and plenary action;[86] but where the violation of an injunction is willful, the summary method of correction is imperative[87] and will not be arrested by the fact that the proofs of violation are conflicting.[88] Also, while it is within the discretion of the court in contempt proceedings to pass upon the question whether a new, changed, or modified device, process, or apparatus adopted by defendant since the granting of the injunction constitutes a violation thereof,[89] or refuse to pass upon it[90] and remit complainant to some other remedy,[91] yet the court will not ordinarily deal with the question[92] or adjudge defendant in contempt for having adopted the change,[93] unless the change is a mere colorable equivalent of the device, process, or apparatus which has been adjudged to be an infringement.[94] Questions relating to the validity of the patent will not be tried in contempt proceedings;[95] and where the injunction was granted on the strength of a prior adjudication construing the patent, such construction will be followed on the hearing of a motion for an attachment for contempt in violating the injunction.[96] In denying a motion for an attachment, the court may expressly limit the decision so that it shall be without prejudice to either party in other proceedings[97] and not conclusive on any question that may be raised on the account-

U. S., 238 Fed. 194, 151 CCA 270). (3) While the public and private remedies may be combined in one proceeding (Electro-Bleaching Gas Co. v. Paradon Engineering Co., 15 F. (2d) 854), (4) defendant must not be left in any doubt as to whether he is called upon to face a criminal charge (Electro-Bleaching Gas Co. v. Paradon Engineering Co., supra), (5) and a civil contempt proceeding "begun and prosecuted by a litigant to preserve an individual property right, should not, in disregard of his interest, be turned by the court at the end into a criminal prosecution, merely to speed a hearing in an appellate court" (Turner v. U. S., supra). (6) Pleadings as indicating civil character of proceeding see infra note 81 [a], [b]. (7) "Under existing practice no steps will be taken to punish on the criminal side of the court, except on the interposition of the United States attorney." Gordon v. Turco-Halvah Co., Inc., 233 Fed. 430, 432 [aff 247 Fed. 487, 159 CCA 541].

[a] Prayer for issuance of attachment (1) is such a common and appropriate prayer for process in a purely civil contempt proceeding that it will not be considered sufficient to put respondent on notice that he is in jeopardy of an order which will be in part punitive, rather than coercive or otherwise remedial. Monroe Body Co. v. Herzog, 18 F. (2d) 578 [mod 13 F. (2d) 705]. (2) Notice generally see infra § 612.

[b] Entitling of a motion and order to show cause in the action indicates, in the absence of a specific demand that defendant be adjudged guilty of a criminal contempt, that plaintiff is seeking to have defendant adjudged guilty of a civil contempt. Electro-Bleaching Gas Co. v. Paradon Engineering Co., 15 F. (2d) 854.

82. See cases infra this note.

[a] Presumptions.—(1) Machines designated by the same name and made by the same company as the machines containing infringing devices, the manufacture and sale of which were enjoined, will be presumed to be the same, in the absence of any denial, in proceedings to punish a violation of the injunction. Stahl v. Ertel, 62 Fed. 920. (2) Defendant, four months before the service of an injunction on him, executed a bond to plaintiff, acknowledging the validity of his patent and his right to all that was granted by it. It was held that the bond was no evidence of a breach of the injunction further than the recital that defendant had infringed the patent might have a tendency to establish such breach, and that the inference or presumption arising from it might be overcome by credible and positive testimony, proving no infringement. Byam v. Eddy, 4 F. Cas. No. 2,263, 2 Blatchf. 521, 24 Vt. 666.

[b] Burden of proof.—The burden of establishing the violation of the injunction rests with complainant. Electro-Bleaching Gas Co. v. Paradon Engineering Co., 15 F. (2d) 854; Accumulator Co. v. Consolidated Electric Storage Co., 53 Fed. 793.

[c] Admissibility.—(1) On a motion for attachment for contempt for violating an injunction issued to restrain the infringement of a patent, after a construction has been given to a patent by the court, no testimony is admissible to vary such construction. Burdett v. Estey, 4 F. Cas. No. 2,146, 4 Bann. & A. 141, 16 Blatchf. 105 [rev on other grounds 109 U. S. 633, 3 SCt 531, 27 L. ed. 1058]. (2) Affidavits to show that the patentee was not the first and original inventor of the thing patented are immaterial and irrelevant. Whipple v. Hutchinson, 29 F. Cas. No. 17,517, 4 Blatchf. 190. (3) It is a matter of discretion whether the court will receive expert testimony on the question of infringement or violation, or will examine the alleged infringing articles for itself. Burdett v. Estey, supra.

[d] Question of fact determined on evidence.—On the hearing of the motion the question as to whether the machine constructed is the same as the old one enjoined is one of fact to be determined on the evidence. ing under the interlocutory decree.[98] While some discretion is vested in the court,[99] nevertheless the order to be entered in the proceeding is not exclusively a discretionary one.[1]

Sufficiency of writ. Where the writ of injunction does not describe the things enjoined, but merely refers to the bill for this purpose, it cannot be the foundation for an attachment for contempt against any person,[2] except perhaps a defendant who has been served with the bill.[3]

Costs.[4] Where, after the granting of an injunction, defendant promptly entered upon a practice which violated it, he may, upon being adjudged guilty of contempt, be directed to pay the costs of the contempt proceedings.[5] Under some circumstances plaintiff may be required to pay the costs of a motion for attachment;[6] but where the injunction has been violated, and defendant is protected from the consequences only by a defect in the service of the writ, no costs will be allowed to him on denial of a motion for an attachment for such violation.[7]

[§ 612] (b) Knowledge or Notice. Actual service of an injunction upon the person sought to be restrained from infringing a patent is not requisite to lay the foundation of a proceeding against him for contempt,[8] actual notice of the order of injunction being deemed sufficient;[9] but before a party who has violated an injunction against infringing a patent can be punished for contempt, it must appear that he has been served with notice of the proceedings therefor,[10] or has appeared in the proceedings;[11] and before criminal punishment for contempt can be imposed upon a person, he must be given notice of some kind, however informal, that such punishment is sought by the complaining party or the United States or is contemplated by the court.[12]

[§ 613] (c) Persons or Corporations Liable. Defendant in a patent infringement suit is in contempt where he violates an injunction[13] on his own behalf[14] or as agent of another person,[15] or where the injunction is violated by his agents, servants, or employees;[16] and where he organizes a company and continues the infringement both he[17] and the corporation[18] are liable. Also an officer of defendant corporation is guilty of contempt where, after the granting of the injunction, he continues infringement individually[19] or in the name of another company;[20] and one who knowingly assists another in violating an injunction is likewise guilty of contempt;[21] but a person cannot be adjudged guilty of contempt where he is not a party to the record and is not an agent, servant, or employee of defendant or in collusion with him.[22]

[a] Injunction ordered but not issued.—(1) Where an injunction against the infringement of a patent has been ordered, a party who, having knowledge of that order, deliberately violates the injunction ordered, although not yet issued, is guilty of contempt of court. Dowagiac Mfg. Co. v. Minnesota Moline Plow Co., 124 Fed. 736 [aff 129 Fed. 1005, 64 CCA 122]. See Union Tool Co. v. Wilson, 259 U. S. 107, 42 SCt 427, 66 L. ed. 848 [aff 265 Fed. 669] (dictum). (2) However, in order to convict a person of contempt under such circumstances, it must be shown clearly that he had knowledge of the order of injunction in such a way that it can be held that he understood it, and with that knowledge committed willful violation of the order. [a] Illustrations.—(1) One who with knowledge of an injunction enjoining certain persons from infringement takes over their business and continues it in collusion with them is guilty of contempt. (2) Assisting another infringer in a suit contesting the validity of the patent is contempt. Bate Refrigerating Co. v. Gillett, 30 Fed. 683.

22. See cases infra this note.

[a] Former employee of defendant is not in contempt where he is acting independently. E. W. Bliss Co. v. Atlantic Handle Co., 212 Fed. 190; Donaldson v. Roksament Stone Co., 178 Fed. 103.

[b] Agent of purchaser pendente lite.—An agent of a corporation which purchased the property and business of defendant after the suit was instituted and before the decree of injunction was issued, and which is not a party to the record, is not in contempt. Bate Refrigerating Co. v. Gillett, 30 Fed. 685.

[c] Part owner of patent.—Where one part owner of a patent, together with his agents, servants, and employees, has been restrained by injunction from sending out notices of infringement of the patent to plaintiff's customers, another part owner who is not a party defendant or subject to the jurisdiction of the court, and is not an agent, servant, or employee of defendant, cannot be punished for contempt in sending out, in his own behalf, notices of infringe-violated by a continuance of a prior practice[23] or by the adoption of a mere subterfuge or colorable change or modification;[24] but it is not violated by the adoption of a new construction which does not infringe the patent[25] or by the use of a combination after the expiration of the patent thereon;[26] and an act which may constitute a breach of a contract entered into by complainant and defendant after the granting of the injunction does not necessarily constitute contempt.[27]

Place of sale. An injunction against infringement of a patent may be violated by a sale outside the territorial jurisdiction of the court granting the injunction,[28] unless the sale is in a foreign country to which the monopoly of the patent does not extend.[29]

Contributory infringement of a patent may constitute disobedience of an injunction.[30]

Advertising for sale articles which have been adjudged infringements of complainant's patent does not in itself constitute a breach of an injunction against a sale,[31] but it is of course a violation of a clause of an injunction specifically prohibiting advertising,[32] and is also strong evidence of the violation of the injunction in other respects.[33]

[§ 615] (e) Defenses and Mitigation. That the injunction was granted upon a patent which has since been materially altered by disclaimer constitutes a defense in contempt proceedings.[34] Matters held not to constitute excuses for violating an injunction against infringement of a patent include a misnomer in the injunction,[35] temptation due to financial straits,[36] and the fact that the infringing article, device, or machine is made according to a junior patent.[37]

Matters mitigating punishment but not excusing violation. The fact that the injunction was erroneously granted furnishes no excuse for its violation,[38] but may be considered in mitigation of punishment.[39] Also, in civil contempt proceedings,[40] good faith or absence of intention to infringe the patent or violate the injunction is no excuse for violation,[41] but it may be considered in mitigation of the penalty,[42] and no punishment for criminal contempt can be imposed where there is a mere violation of an injunction in good faith, and without any intention to disobey or set at naught the order of the court, or any willful and contumacious disregard of the authority of the court.[43] Likewise, in civil contempt proceedings,[44] the advice of counsel is not a suffi-

[a] Spirit of injunction.—Although the command of an injunction against the infringement of a patent must be explicitly obeyed, yet it is the spirit and not the letter of the injunction which must be obeyed. Bate Refrigerating Co. v. Gillett, 30 Fed. 683.

[b] Retention of principle.—Where the principle involved in a patent is the point in issue in a suit to restrain its infringement, defendant commits a breach of a preliminary injunction and is punishable for contempt where, for the purpose of evading the injunction, he continues to manufacture articles involving the same principle, with but slight modifications of structure. cient excuse for violating the injunction,[45] but where it has been honestly relied upon, a heavy penalty will not usually be imposed.[46]

[§ 616] d. Indemnity Bond.[47] In lieu of an injunction defendant may be required to give a bond conditioned for the payment of damages and profits awarded,[48] and, in addition to the bond, to file periodical statements showing the business done by him in respect of the alleged infringing devices;[49] but where the validity and infringement of the patent are clear, the court will often refuse to accept a bond in lieu of an injunction,[50] unless defendant would suffer great injury from an injunction.[51] Defendant will, on his motion, be relieved and discharged from further performance of an order requiring him to give bond and file monthly statements where, subsequent to the granting of the order, the court of appeals of the same circuit held the patent to be void.[52]

[§ 617] e. Profits and Damages[53]—(1) Distinctions. Defendant's profits and complainant's damages from the infringement of a patent are distinct from and independent of each other[54] and are governed by different principles.[55]

[§ 618] (2) Right to Generally.[56] In a suit for infringement of a patent, compensation for past infringement may be awarded.[57]

Profits generally. In equity complainant may ordinarily recover the amount of the gains and profits that defendant has made from his unauthorized use of the patented invention,[58] even though the owner

American Bottle Cap Co., 250 Fed. 865, 867 ("This is a patent cause in which the relief prayed, aside from the recovery of profits and damages, is an injunction against acts of infringement. On the showing which has been made the plaintiff is entitled to a preliminary injunction, but not to an order against the American Bottle Cap Company in invitum for the giving of bond as moved for. After the awarding of a preliminary injunction, if the parties agree upon the giving of bond by the defendant in a given amount, to the end that it may be relieved from the possible hardship of an injunction, the court would not interpose any objection to the carrying into effect of such an arrangement. But such procedure is totally unlike that now proposed by the plaintiff").

[a] Such course is proper (1) where an injunction would injure the public (American Ordnance Co. v. Driggs-Seabury Co., 87 Fed. 947; Campbell Printing-Press, etc., Co. v. Manhattan R. Co., 47 Fed. 663; Southwestern Brush Electric Light, etc., Co. v. Louisiana Electric Light Co., 45 Fed. 893; Guidet v. Palmer, 11 F. Cas. No. 5,859, 10 Blatchf. 217, 6 Fish. Pat. Cas. 82), (2) or would result in considerable loss and injury to defendant (Karfiol v. Rothner, 151 Fed. 777), (3) and the patent has only a very short time to run (Interurban R., etc., Co. v. Westinghouse Electric, etc., Co., 186 Fed. 166, 108 CCA 298; Draper Co. v. American Loom Co., 161 Fed. 728, 88 CCA 588).

[b] Computation of amount of bond.—In fixing the amount of a bond required of defendant in a suit for infringement of patents as a condition to the refusing of a preliminary injunction, the amount of the profits made by him from the alleged infringement affords the only approximate basis for computation. Karfiol v. Rothner, 151 Fed. 779.

of the patent has made no use of the invention covered thereby;[59] but profits accruing after complainant sells his patent pending suit cannot be recovered by him.[60] While there can be no recovery of, or decree for, profits where defendant has not realized any gains, profits, or savings from the sale or use of the patented invention,[61] or it is not shown that he realized any,[62] yet where defendant has entered into an individual contract to install an apparatus for a consideration which includes a profit, he is liable for the profits made under the contract,[63] notwithstanding his attempted assignment of the contract and its profits after part performance.[64]

Damages generally. Damages for infringement of a valid patent during the life or term thereof may be recovered at law,[65] or in equity,[66] or, at least, in equity damages may be recovered in certain cases,[67] but not unless plaintiff could have recovered such damages in an action at law,[68] or there is a ground upon which a recovery of damages can be based.[69] Damages for use of the invention before the issuance of the patent cannot be recovered.[70]

[a] "Reasons (1) that have led to the adoption of this rule are, that it comes nearer than any other to doing complete justice between the parties; that in equity the profits made by the infringer of a patent belong to the patentee and not to the infringer; and that it is inconsistent with the ordinary principles and practice of courts of chancery, either, on the one hand, to permit the wrongdoer to profit by his own wrong, or, on the other hand, to make no allowance for the cost and expense of conducting his business, or to undertake to punish him by obliging him to pay more than a fair compensation to the person wronged." Stearns, 227 Fed. 74, 77, 141 CCA 622.

[b] Origin and affirmation of rule. —(1) The rule stated in the text was established by a series of decisions under Patent Act July 4, 1836 c 357 (5 St. at L. 117), although that act simply conferred upon the courts of the United States general equity jurisdiction, with the power to grant injunctions, in cases arising under the patent laws. "The rule for recovering in equity for infringement of a patent is that where the net profits earned by reason of the infringement do not sufficiently compensate the owner of the

when,[73] defendant's profits are insufficient to compensate plaintiff for the loss or injury which he has sustained from the infringement.[74] In England and Canada both damages and profits cannot be recovered[75] from the same infringer,[76] and plaintiff must elect between the two.[77]

Neither profits nor damages are recoverable where there has been no infringement.[78] A decree for damages or profits cannot be rendered against a person who is not a party to the suit;[79] and where suit is brought by two or more complainants as joint owners only, there can be no recovery of profits or damages inuring to the benefit of one complainant only as a licensee,[80] or as sole owner prior to the date of joint ownership.[81]

Damages from wrongful issuance of injunction. The dissolution of an injunction in a patent infringement suit does not necessarily entitle defendant to damages,[82] but he may be entitled to damages where complainant obtained the injunction or restraining order by giving a bond[83] or without directing the attention of the court to the fact that the patent had expired.[84]

[§ 619] (3) Measure and Amount—(a) In General. A sum fixed arbitrarily by the court,[85] and not based upon any evidence in the record[86] or any finding,[87] cannot be awarded as profits or damages in a suit for infringement of a patent. Profits and damages cannot be said to be the measure of each other.[88]

[§ 620] (b) Profits—aa. In General. The profits recoverable in equity for the infringement of a patent extend[89] and are limited[90] to the actual profits which have been made by defendant[91] directly and patent for its infringement, there may, in a proper case, be awarded damages in addition to the ascertained net profits." Philadelphia Rubber Works Co. v. U. S. Rubber Reclaiming Works, 276 Fed. 600, 603 [aff 277 Fed. 171 (certiorari den 257 U. S. 660 mem, 42 SCt 187 mem, 66 L. ed. 422 mem)].

(2d) 856 (where profits are adequate compensation for the entire invasion of the patentee's rights, he is not entitled to have them duplicated in the form of damages, but he is entitled to make a choice between the two, and it is not the province of the court to make it for him).

[a] Where sales were made in direct competition with complainant, and complainant is allowed the profits which defendant made, he is not entitled also to recover as damages the profits he would have made from the same sales of his own machines. immediately[92] from his wrongful appropriation of the patented invention, regardless of the fixed license fees or royalties paid to complainant by third persons,[93] defendant's skill and intelligence,[94] or the gains or profits which defendant might have made.[95] There can be no decree for profits as a punishment for infringement,[96] and while the damages found can,[97] the profits found cannot,[98] be increased in equity. Ordinarily the question of what constitutes profits is to be determined in a patent infringement suit by applying the principles governing the determination of what constitutes profits generally[99] or profits in noninfringing situations;[1] but in a case of willful infringement all doubts as to the amount of profits are resolved against the infringer.[2]

[§ 621] bb. Saving from Use of Invention. Where the infringement consisted of the use of a patented process, device, or machine,[3] as distinguished from the sale, or manufacture and sale, of a patented article, device, or machine,[4] and there is a proper standard of comparison,[5] the profits for which the infringer is liable may be measured by the saving or advantage which he has derived from the use of the patented invention over what he would have had in using other means then open to the public and adequate to obtain an equally beneficial result,[6] and he may be held liable for such saving or advantage even though, from other causes, his general business in which the invention was employed has not been profitable;[7] but this rule, which is known as the "standard of comparison" rule,[8] is not applicable where there is no proper standard of comparison,[9] and the entire profits derived from the sale of the product made by using a patented machine or process may be recovered where there is no proper standard of comparison[10] or no profits could have been made by employing old methods.[11]

[§ 622] cc. Entire or Apportioned Profits[12]—(aa) In General. Complainant is entitled to recover all the profits derived by an infringer from the sale or use of an article where the patent covers the article as an entirety,[13] the article is a new and complete article of manufacture,[14] and the infringer does not show that a portion of the profits is the result of some other thing used by him.[15] Also complainant is entitled to recover all the profits realized by an infringer from the sale of an article or machine where its sale, or its entire value as a marketable commodity, is due solely to the patented feature thereof;[16] and likewise the owner of a patent

"If salable articles . . . could not be made at the ruling prices, by the old methods, without a loss, while with the machine of the patent there would be a profit, the profit so made has certainly been saved or gained from the invention. The saving might be more than this, dependent on the extent of the loss with other machines. It is clear that it would not be less. But the reckoning, as it is to be observed, is not up, but down. That is to say, we start with the price at which marketable insulators could not be profitably made on the old machines, and fall to their cost by the new, and the difference represents the saving or gain between the two." Novelty Glass Mfg. Co. v. Brookfield, 170 Fed. 946, 957, 95 CCA 516.

"There are many cases in which the plaintiff's patent is only a part of the machine and creates only a part of the profits. His invention may have been used in combination with valuable improvements made, or other patents appropriated by the infringer, and each may have jointly, but unequally, contributed to the profits. In such case, if plaintiff's patent only created a part of the profits, he is only entitled to recover that part of the net gains." Westinghouse Electric, etc., Co. v. [a] Reason for rule.—"When a case of confusion does appear—when it is impossible to make a mathematical or approximate apportionment—then from the very necessity of the case one party or the other must secure the entire fund. It must be kept by the infringer, or it must be awarded, by law, to the patentee. On established principles of equity, and on the plainest principles of justice, the separation or apportionment[24] which rests upon him.[25] In a case of partial commingling or confusion of profits an award to plaintiff should extend no further than the actual commingling requires or permits.[26]

Infringer of patent for combination may be,[27] but is not necessarily,[28] liable for the entire profits.

[§ 623] (bb) Mode of Apportionment. In apportioning profits derived in part from the infringement of a patent, the net profits are to be rationally separated[29] so that neither party may have what rightfully belongs to the other.[30] Only reasonable approximation,[31] and not mathematical exactness,[32] is required, and where the infringement was deliberate, all doubts as to apportionment of profits should be resolved against the infringer.[33] It is sometimes permissible to apportion profits on a cost ratio basis,[34] or, in other words, by awarding to plaintiff such proportion of the total profits as the cost of the infringing part bears to the cost of the whole structure,[35] but this method is not always the best one[36] or preferable to all other methods,[37] and it should not be adopted where, under the circumstances, it is apparent that there should be assigned to the infringing part a share of the profits larger than is permissible under this method.[38] The profits should not be apportioned by fixing a unit profit figure for the infringing part corresponding to the average profit derived from a few special sales of that part alone.[39]

[§ 624] dd. Deductions from Receipts—(aa) In General. In determining the profits which have been realized by defendant from the manufacture and sale of an infringing article, machine, or device, and for which he is liable, it is proper to deduct from the receipts all actual and legitimate expenses of manufacture[40] and sale,[41] but not a manufacturer's profit.[42] deferred selling[43] or advertising[44] expenses of a year prior to the accounting period, the cost of changes made to satisfy the purchaser a considerable time after the infringement was completed,[45] the cost of manufacturing[46] or the expense of an guilty trustee cannot take advantage of his own wrong The fact that he may lose something of his own is a misfortune which he has brought upon himself; and if, as argued, the fund may have been made by the use of other patents also, for which he may be liable in another case, it is again a misfortune which he has brought upon himself and an instance of a double wrong causing double liability. He cannot appeal to a court of conscience to cast the loss upon an innocent patentee and by judicial decree repeal the provision of Rev. Stat., § 4921, which declares that in case of infringement the complainant shall be entitled to recover the 'profits to be accounted for by the defendant.'" Westinghouse Electric, etc., Co. v. [a] "In other words, even though confusion of profits exists, whenever the court reaches a point or sum where it is demonstrable that to go beyond that point or exceed that sum is to set over to plaintiff profits to which the infringing elements make no contribution, that point or sum is the proper place to stop in enforcing the rule. . . . All profits of the defendant which can with reasonable accuracy be attributed to noninfringing parts are to be deducted, before the rule which attends confusion of profit is applied." [a] Thus, where a patent, although using old elements, gives the entire value to a combination, plaintiff is entitled to recover all the profits. Westinghouse Electric, etc., Co. v. Wagner Electric, etc., Co., 225 U. S. 604, 32 SCt 691, 56 L. ed. 1222, 41 LRANS 653.

[a] Improvement of part of device.—Where the real invention of a patent consists only in the improvement of a part of a device, profits made by an infringer from the sale of the entire article are prima facie apportionable, although the patent describes the entire combination. [a] Objections to method.—This method is somewhat artificial and arbitrary in that it "necessarily assumes an equal margin of profit upon each dollar invested, whether in the infringing parts or the noninfringing parts, and relegates all parts to a position of equality of importance in the assembled product." [a] Factory cost as carried on defendant's books.—The factory cost of the infringing article, as carried on the books of defendant corporation, and according to which it has reckoned its profits, computed and paid its income and excess profits taxes, compiled its inventions and made up its balance sheets, is properly taken by the referee and trial judge as the basis of calculating infringing profits where it points to the factory cost of manufacture more directly than any other evidence in the case, even though it is vigorously attacked by both parties because it wholly destroys both of their theories. unsuccessful attempt to sell[47] articles which have not been sold, or expenses which are not shown to have been connected with,[48] or made necessary by,[49] defendant's manufacture and sale of the infringing articles. It is proper to deduct the price at which materials were purchased for the purpose of infringement,[50] but not a rise in price between the time they were purchased and used.[51] No credit is to be allowed for the depletion of oil reserves where such oil is valueless unless treated by plaintiff's process.[52] Expenses which may not be deducted include defendant's expense in reorganizing a corporation,[53] obtaining patents,[54] or engaging in litigation with the owner of the patent involved in the present suit.[55] If the minimum amount of a specific and separable item of expenditure is shown by satisfactory evidence, defendant cannot be deprived of his right to an appropriate credit therefor by a mere failure to keep books.[56]

Cost of patterns necessarily made in producing infringing machines may be allowed as a credit,[57] unless they were useful after infringement ceased, and any depreciation is covered by a general depreciation allowance.[58]

Cost of guaranty of infringing articles or devices sold is a proper credit.[59]

Taxes and insurance premiums are allowable to the infringer on an accounting for profits[60] where they were paid in respect of a plant devoted solely to the infringing business,[61] or where they are properly apportioned,[62] even where defendant's plant was devoted in part to other business.[63]

Losses. Ordinarily losses may be considered in diminution of profits when,[64] and only when,[65] they occurred concurrently with the making of profits and resulted directly from the particular transactions on which the profits are allowed; but the rule may be relaxed as to losses incurred in an effort in good faith to promote and develop the use and sale of the infringing article,[66] such as losses incurred during the first year of the infringing business,[67] and it may also be relaxed where the infringer was carrying on a regular and continuous business and it is impractical to treat the infringing articles as constituting a vast number of separate infringements.[68]

Apportionment. Where defendant is carrying a business which is both infringing and noninfringing, and the proportion of each is ascertainable, the ex-

As there were no profits on such attempted sales, there can be nothing to deduct, and expenses incurred and paid in such attempted sale, or attempts to make sales, but which proved a failure, cannot be charged against profits or used to reduce a recovery of profits actually realized from the sales actually made." [a] Lenses.—"While the defendant was an infringer, it was carrying on a regular and continuous business, during the period of its operations in the manufacture of the infringing lenses. In this continuous business, the infringing lenses cannot be treated separately as constituting a vast number of separate infringements. Hence, in determining the profits, if defendant is charged with the gross sales at the gross selling price, it must be credited with all those items which entered into the cost of manufacture and sale, such as lenses returned, defective lenses, the loss from bad debts and accounts in the sale of the infringing lenses, and also such discounts and allowances as were reasonably incident to the business, so that the defendant may be charged only with the prof-

penses of the business may and should be apportioned.[69] Also there should be an apportionment of the expense of salesmen where such expenses are abnormal in view of the business in hand and part has been incurred for the purpose of creating a market and good will for defendant's goods after the expiration of the patent.[70]

[§ 625] (bb) Use of Property or Interest on Capital. Interest on the capital invested in the infringing portion of defendant's business,[71] or, in other words, the value of the use of buildings, machinery, tools, or other facilities or property employed in manufacturing the infringing article or machine,[72] may be deducted from the receipts in arriving at the profits unless the property is employed in manufacturing both infringing and non-infringing articles and it is impossible upon the evidence presented to make a satisfactory apportionment.[73] An allowance of a separate item of this nature is not permissible where the subject matter thereof is included in another item which has been allowed.[74] Interest on dividends is not a charge which can be made in favor of the infringer.[75]

Royalties paid by defendant for the use of other patents,[76] or, in case infringement of another patent has been adjudged, a reasonable royalty charge for the use of the patent,[77] may be deducted from receipts as a part of the cost of manufacture or production.

[§ 626] (cc) Compensation for Personal Services.[78] Wages paid other persons for labor in manufacturing the infringing article or device may be deducted in determining the profits for which an infringing manufacturer is liable.[79]

Where defendant is a corporation, it is proper to allow a deduction of the usual salaries paid managing officers[80] in good faith[81] for services actually rendered,[82] and not as a mode of concealing or dividing profits;[83] but it is improper to allow a deduction for salaries which have never been paid,[84]

"The weight of authority at the present time in infringement cases favors the allowance of interest on capital which it was necessary to invest in order to make the profits to be accounted for, where the plant in which the capital is invested is devoted wholly to the production of the infringing article, and in other cases where an apportionment can be made with reasonable certainty." [a] Rule is just and equitable.—Producers', etc., Corp. v. Lehmann, 18 F. (2d) 492.

[b] Use of old plant.—A credit for interest on the capital invested is not to be denied defendant because the plant and facilities used by him for the manufacture of the infringing device are old, have been previously devoted to other business, and were not constructed for the purpose of manufacturing the infringing device. [a] Reasons for rule.—"It would be very great injustice, if the quantum of gains and profits recoverable by a complainant depended on the question, how much of such gains and profits the defendants used for their own support, or the support of their families, or, as even more broadly claimed here by the defendants, how much they saw fit to appropriate to their own use. Infringers would rarely be required to pay over anything, if they could divide the gains and profits among themselves, under the name of salary, wages, or any other designation. Men work for gains and profits, but they are gains and profits still. Men support themselves and their families out of their gains and profits, but that does not change their nature. If it were not so, inventors might, by reason of infringements, fail to obtain anything, and the infringers obtain what they see fit to term adequate salaries, out of their piracy." Williams v. sult of the infringement,[2] or, in other words, the measure of damages is the actual[3] pecuniary[4] loss sustained by plaintiff. While the pecuniary loss arising from infringement can be determined only through a reasonable approximation,[5] and any doubts as to the amount of damages for which defendant is liable will be resolved against him where he has deliberately and persistently infringed the patent,[6] nevertheless an estimate of the amount of a particular item of damages must be based upon some data[7] and not upon mere guess or speculation.[8]

Normal measure of damages. As the exclusive right conferred by a patent is property,[9] and an infringement is a tortious taking of a part of that property,[10] the normal measure of damages is the value of what is taken.[11]

Defendant's gains or profits.[12] Ordinarily what plaintiff has lost,[13] and not what defendant has gained,[14] is the measure of damages, and where plaintiff has suffered real loss or injury from the infringement, he may recover therefor even though defendant has suffered losses or has not realized any profits,[15] but the profits derived by the infringer may be considered in estimating damages in an exceptional case,[16] as where there was only a limited demand in a limited locality for a particular kind of article and this demand could be supplied easily and promptly by a single manufacturer,[17] or where there are no other means of estimating damages.[18] Where both damages and profits are awarded in equity, the damages should be for such amount as, added to defendant's profits, will fully compensate plaintiff for the loss or injury sustained from the infringement.[19]

Counsel fees and expenses of litigation cannot be included in the damages.[20]

Full or apportioned damages. Full damages may be recovered[21] only for full infringement according to the nature of the patent.[22] Where the patent covers only a part of a machine, the damages must be confined to those arising from the manufacture, use, or sale of that part,[23] unless the entire value of the machine is due to the patented feature.[24] Damages for infringement of separate patents sued on need not be apportioned.[25]

Mitigation. Damages may be mitigated by good faith and lack of intent to infringe upon the part of the infringer;[26] but where a part of a machine is found to infringe complainant's patent, the court will not undertake to determine, in reduction of damages, the collateral question whether or not such part also infringes another patent, the validity and scope of which are not directly put in issue.[27]

[§ 629] bb. Nominal or Substantial Damages. Nominal damages only may be recovered where plaintiff has not satisfactorily shown the existence and amount of actual damages or profits due to the unauthorized use of his patented invention,[28] unless, in the case of commingled profits, a separation or apportionment is impossible by reason of defendant's acts or conduct.[29] Also, nominal damages only may be recovered where the infringement was only a trifling infraction of plaintiff's rights,[30] it consisted in the mere making of a patented article without either selling or using it,[31] or it was committed innocently by an employee.[32] On the other hand, where validity and infringement of the patent, as well as title thereto, are proved, plaintiff is entitled to recover at least nominal damages,[33] and he is entitled to recover substantial damages where he has been substantially injured by the infringement of his exclusive right[34] and the evidence is sufficient to furnish a reasonable basis for the application of some rule for measuring the damages.[35] The acceptance of the "reasonable royalty" rule for measuring damages[36] has had the effect of materially lessening the cases in which nominal damages only are awarded.[37]

Commercial value of patent. Plaintiff is entitled to substantial, rather than nominal, damages where defendant has extensively converted to his own use property rights of great value conferred by the patent,[38] and, conversely, only nominal damages may be recovered where the patent is without real commercial value;[39] but the mere fact that plaintiff was not commercially successful during the infringing period does not necessarily signify that the patented invention lacks commercial value[40] or disentitle plaintiff to recover substantial damages actually sustained through the infringement.[41]

[§ 630] cc. Profits Lost by Plaintiff. In a case where the facts shown render the rule applicable,[42] plaintiff's damages in a patent infringement suit may be measured by the profits which, except for the infringement, he would have made[43] on the infringing sales made by defendant,[44] and such profits may be estimated according to the price which he would have received, except for the infringing competition,[45] less the cost of manufacture and sale,[46] or they may be estimated according to the average profit realized by plaintiff during a reasonable period of time.[47] A satisfactory showing that plaintiff would have made the sales in question except for the infringement[48] and that he was ready and equipped to supply the demand[49] is necessary and sufficient to render the rule applicable.

Diminished profits on plaintiff's sales. Where sales made by plaintiff were necessarily made at a reduced price by reason of the infringement, such reduction in price is a proper item of damages.[50]

[a] Patent covering only part of device or manufacturing processes.—(1) Defendant is liable for the profits plaintiff would have made on a complete device where, although some of the parts were old, and the patent nominally was only for an improvement, the device as a whole was new and it was the patented invention that gave value and made it salable (Reed Roller Bit Co. v. (3) However, a recovery of a loss of profits on a contract for the supplying of a product, in the performance of which an infringing machine was used, cannot extend to the profits which might have been realized from the complete manufacture of the finished product from raw materials where such manufacture includes, in addition to a process which involves the patented invention, several other distinct processes which produce a finished commercial commodity and do not involve the patented invention. [a] Overhead expense.—(1) It is proper to deduct the increase in plaintiff's overhead expense which would have resulted from handling the additional business. Riverside Heights Orange Growers' Assoc. v. Stebler, 240 Fed. 703, 153 CCA 501. (2) However, in computing plaintiff's overhead charges, it is proper to restrict advertising expense to the normal expenditure. Auto Vacuum Freezer Co. v. William A. Sexton Co., 250 Fed. 459.

[b] Price of materials purchased.—Although the parties have entered into a stipulation as to the cost to complainant of producing the material upon which his patented process is used, yet where it subsequently appears that complainant does not produce the material but purchases it from another person and the price at which he purchased it during the period in controversy is definitely established, the latter figure will be taken as a basis for calculating damages consisting of profits he would have made except for the infringement. [a] Exceptional contracts.—(1) A fee may be regarded as fixed, although exceptions are sometimes made. Asmus v. Freeman, 34 Fed. 902. (2) However, where there is no fixed and established royalty, the fee or royalty provided for in exceptional contracts cannot be taken as the measure of damages. Greenleaf v. Yale Lock Mfg. Co., 10 F. Cas. No. 5,783, 4 Bann. & A. 583, 17 Blatchf. 253.

[b] Granting of single license is not sufficient to establish a fixed royalty as against an infringer. Muther v. United Shoe Mach. Co., 21 F. (2d) 773.

[c] Royalty previously agreed upon by parties.—As to sales made by defendant at a loss, it is not improper to allow a recovery against him of a royalty fixed at a certain percentage of the receipts from sales in a license previously agreed upon to the parties and afterward canceled. McKee Glass Co. v. H. C. Fry Glass Co., 248 Fed. 125, 160 CCA 265.

[d] Fee established by exclusive licensee.—Where the owners of a patent granted an exclusive license thereunder, authorizing the licensee to grant licenses to others on such terms as he saw fit, reserving as a royalty a certain per cent of the profits realized by the licensee in a joint suit by the owners and licensee for infringement which interfered with sales by the licensee and the granting of licenses, the license fee established, charged, and received by the licensee may properly be taken as a basis for the computation of damages recoverable from the infringer. (2d) 502, 505 ("The prevailing royalty or license rate for the infringement period is the measure of a patentee's damages, and not the rate at which the invention was licensed during an earlier period, when the patentee was willing to take almost anything to get the invention introduced").

[a] Reduction before or after commencement of infringement.—(1) Complainant is entitled to recover damages at the rate of the lowest license fee charged down to the time when infringement began (American Sulphite Pulp Co. v. De Grasse Paper Co., 193 Fed. 653, 113 CCA 521 [rev 190 Fed. 39, and certiorari den 225 U. S. 712 mem, 32 SCt 841 mem, 56 L. ed. 1268 mem]), (2) especially where such fee remained the prevailing rate during the period of infringement (Expanded Metal Co. v. General Fireproofing Co., 247 Fed. 899 [app dism 272 Fed. 1021 mem]). (3) A royalty or license fee is not to be regarded as wanting in uniformity because it was higher in the early days and later reduced to a certain basis where it was reduced to that basis before the infringement began and was not further reduced during the period of infringement. Expanded Metal Co. v. General Fireproofing Co., supra. (4) Where two different uniform license fees under a patent prevailed at different periods of time, the fee having been reduced on a certain date, an infringer whose infringement commenced during the first period and extended into the second may properly be charged with damages at the higher rate until he ceased to infringe; but where he subsequently again commenced infringement, his liability should be measured by the rate then prevailing. Fox v. Knickerbocker Engraving Co., 158 Fed. 422 [aff 165 Fed. 442, 91 CCA 386].

57. Rude v. Westcott, 130 U. S. 152, 9 SCt 463, 32 L. ed. 888.

[a] Similar or different circumstances.—"In cases of infringement, damages are not to be assessed solely on the basis of royalty or license unless there is evidence shewing that under similar circumstances certain definite prices have been charged and paid. It would be proper to consider what was charged and paid for royalties under other circumstances as one of the factors or elements in assessing the damages, but it is improper to treat it as the sole determining factor." Consolidated Wafer Co., Ltd. v. International Cone Co., Ltd., 59 Ont. L. 205, 209, [1926] 4 DomLR 74.

[b] Different territory.—The price for which the patentee has sold his rights in a certain territory is no criterion by which to determine the amount of damage sustained by an infringement in other territory. Campbell v. Barclay, 4 F. Cas. No. 2,353, 5 Biss. 179.

[c] Fee charged after adjudication of invalidity of patent.—The sum exacted by the patentee during the period intervening between an adjudication of the invalidity of the patent and a final adjudication of its validity cannot be regarded as a true established royalty or as an index of the actual value of the patentee's right. Consolidated Rubber Tire Co. v. Diamond Rubber Co., 226 Fed. 455 [aff 232 Fed. 475, 146 CCA 469].

[d] Licenses granted to auxiliary companies.—"The sum charged by the patentee as royalty to auxiliary companies, who receive exclusive licenses for a designated territory, and who invest capital and incur the expense of preparing plants, and enter into the business of supplying the patented article, would be an inadequate royalty and measure of damages for infringement. The patentee, in consideration of the benefit which it obtains from the act of co-operation of an auxiliary company, in introducing the patented improvement and exploiting it, thereby securing a far greater return for the use of its invention than could be obtained by dealing with individual users, may well afford to fix a low rate of royalty to such licensees." or more of the inventions are used,[59] or regardless of which one is used.[60]

[§ 632] (bb) Reasonable Royalty.[61] Where it is clear that plaintiff has been substantially injured by the infringement,[62] and neither damages[63] nor profits[64] can be calculated with reasonable certainty by applying any other rule, as where there is no uniform and established royalty or license fee,[65] no evidence of a loss of sales[66] or reduction of profits[67] suffered by plaintiff, and, in case defendant has realized profits,[68] there is no satisfactory evidence of the amount or portion attributable to the use of the patented invention,[69] plaintiff may recover what would have been a reasonable royalty for defendant to pay[70] or, in other words, the amount which, in view of the nature, utility, and advantages of the invention,[71] and the extent of the use involved,[72] the parties would probably have agreed on if plaintiff was willing to grant a license and defendant wished to obtain one,[73] and both parties were reasonably endeavoring to reach an agreement.[74] The rule may be applicable, even though defendant has not realized any profits.[75] However, the rule is to be applied with caution,[76] the amount recoverable is to be conservatively estimated,[77] and in some cases the rule is not applicable,[78] as where profits have been proved and allowed.[79]

Foreign or domestic sales. A reasonable royalty may be recovered on account of a sale made in the country in which the patent was obtained,[80] but not on account of a sale made in another country.[81]

[§ 633] ee. Punitive or Increased Damages. Exemplary damages cannot be included in the verdict in an action at law to recover damages for infringement of a patent,[82] but under statutory proof being divided into separate and distinct inventions).

[a] Leading case.—U. S. Frumentum Co. v. Lauhoff, 216 Fed. 610, 132 CCA 614 is a leading case on the subject. Krentler-Arnold Hinge Last Co. v. Leman, 24 F. (2d) 423.

[b] Terminology.—(1) It is said that, while the damage or compensation recoverable under this rule is conveniently named, and frequently spoken of as, a "reasonable royalty," yet, in precise terminology, it is not a royalty at all, and it may well be called "'general damage'; that is to say, damage not resting on any of the applicable, exact methods of computation but upon facts and circumstances which permit the jury or the court to estimate in a general, but in a sufficiently accurate, way the injury to plaintiff caused by each infringing sale." U. S. Frumentum Co. v. Lauhoff, 216 Fed. 610, 617, 132 CCA 614. (2) However, it is also said that the name given to the value or earning capacity of the patent property, fixed by a court or jury after the event, instead of by the parties in advance, is immaterial; it is not improper to call it a "royalty." Clark v. Schieble Toy, etc., Co., 248 Fed. 276, 160 CCA 354.

[c] Difficulty in determining reasonable royalty does not alone bar the court from adopting that rule of measuring damages. B. F. Goodrich Co. v. Consolidated Rubber Tire Co., 251 Fed. 617, 163 CCA 611 [mod 237 Fed. 893, and certiorari den 247 U. S. 519 mem, 38 SCt 582 mem, 62 L. ed. 1246 mem].

[a] Where defendant only sells, and does not manufacture, the infringing article, it is fair to hold him liable only for one third of a reasonable royalty covering the manufacture, sale, and use of the patented article. Dowagiac Mfg. Co. v. Deere, etc., Co., 284 Fed. 331.

S. 646 mem, 40 SCt 347 mem, 70 L. ed. 778 mem] (reasonable royalty should be fixed at such sum as defendant would probably have consented to pay rather than dispense with the patented machine).

[a] Business proposition.—"The purpose in view in any particular case is to determine what amount a person desiring to manufacture and sell the patented article would, as a business proposition, be willing to pay as a royalty; that is, what amount could he fairly pay as a royalty and be able to make and sell in the market the patented article at a reasonable profit to himself." visions,[83] and the construction placed thereon, the court, either in an action at law[84] or in a suit in equity,[85] may, in its discretion, increase or refuse to increase the damages to any amount not exceeding three times the amount of actual damages found,[86] and damages so increased are spoken of in some cases as punitive damages,[87] although in other cases such characterization is deemed inaccurate.[88] Ordinarily the court will exercise its statutory power to increase damages where the circumstances of the infringement are aggravated,[89] or, in other words, when,[90] and only when,[91] the infringement is willful, deliberate, wanton, or in bad faith.

[§ 634] ff. Interest. In an action at law for infringement of a patent, interest may be allowed by way of damages[92] from the time of infringement[93] or from the time of the commencement of the suit.[94] In a suit in equity the allowance of interest is largely a matter of discretion,[95] and this discretion extends not only to the date from which interest is allowed,[96] but also, within proper limitations, to the rate.[97]

Where damages are calculated upon royalty basis,[98] interest may be allowed[99] from the date or dates when the royalty or royalties would have been due and payable if defendant had been a licensee,[1] but it is not improper to allow interest from the end of the infringing period[2] or even from a date subsequent thereto where considerable time elapsed before the master filed his report and neither party was more responsible than the other for the long delay.[3]

Interest upon award of damages, including the aggregate of principal and interest awarded as damages,[4] is to be computed from the date of the master's report.[5]

[§ 635] (d) For Infringement of Design Patent. Under the pertinent statute,[6] and the construction placed thereon, where the infringement of a design patent was willful after notice, a minimum amount of two hundred and fifty dollars may be collected for each offense,[7] even though the infringer realized no profits,[8] or the profits realized by him are less than the statutory sum;[9] but profits are not recoverable where the design was applied only to a part of an article and it is impossible to segregate the portion of the profits due to the use of the design;[10] damages measured by a reasonable royalty cannot be recovered;[11] and the statutory amount cannot be recovered from a mere seller of an article embodying the design where he was without knowledge of the patent.[12]

[§ 636] (4) Accounting—(a) Order or Decree for Accounting and Reference. A decree finding infringement is a prerequisite to an accounting.[13] Also, where a patent expired before the commencement of a suit for infringement thereof, a court of equity never had jurisdiction of the suit,[14] and it is equally without power to order an accounting of profits and damages arising from alleged infringement of the patent.[15] On the other hand, where the court has jurisdiction and the patent is found to be valid and infringed, plaintiff in an equitable suit is entitled to an accounting of profits and damages,[16] unless the recovery of any substantial damages or profits is so improbable as to justify the court in declining to make an order for an accounting.[17] Where an accounting is ordered, the cause will ordinarily be referred to a master to take and state the account or ascertain the amount to be recovered;[18] but a reference may be refused where it is obvious that the amount involved is too small to warrant the expense thereof.[19]

6. Act Febr. 4, 1887 (24 U. S. St. at L. 387).

[a] Statute is not unconstitutional.—Untermeyer v. Freund, 58 Fed. 205, 7 CCA 183.

7. Frank v. Geiger, 121 Fed. 126; Gimbel v. Hogg, 97 Fed. 791, 38 CCA 419; Fuller v. Field, 82 Fed. 813, 27 CCA 165 [certiorari den 171 U. S. 690 mem, 19 SCt 884 mem]; Lowell Mfg. Co. v. Whittall, 71 Fed. 515; Monroe v. Anderson, 58 Fed. 398, 7 CCA 272; Untermeyer v. Freund, 50 Fed. 77 [aff 58 Fed. 205, 7 CCA 183]; Ripley v. Elson Glass Co., 49 Fed. 927.

[a] Infringement of several claims in one patent constitutes only one offense. Gimbel v. Hogg, 97 Fed. 791, 38 CCA 419.

[b] Facts held to show sufficient notice.—Anderson v. Saint, 46 Fed. 760.

[c] Facts held not to show sufficient notice.—Lichtenstein v. Phipps, 168 Fed. 61, 93 CCA 483 [rev 161 Fed. 578]; Gimbel v. Hogg, 97 Fed. 791, 38 CCA 419 (notice given to public by marking patented article).

8. Pirkl v. Smith, 42 Fed. 410 [aff 154 U. S. 517, 14 SCt 1153, 38 L. ed. 1082].

9. Western Gas Fixture Co. v. Jefferson Glass Co., 296 Fed. 128.

10. Young v. Grand Rapids Refrigerator Co., 268 Fed. 966.

11. Young v. Grand Rapids Refrigerator Co., supra.

[a] Reason for rule.—"The absence of any other measure of recovery is one of the reasons for resorting to a reasonable royalty, and the considerations supporting that measure of damages apply with much lessened force, if at all, to a design patent." Young v. Grand Rapids Refrigerator Co., 268 Fed. 966, 974.

12. Lichtenstein v. Straus, 166 Fed. 319.

13. Franklin Brass Fdy. Co. v. Shapiro, 278 Fed. 435 [mod 268 Fed. 551, 272 Fed. 176].

14. See supra § 524.

16. Alliance Securities Co. v. Mohr, 14 F. (2d) 793 [aff 14 F. (2d) 799]; Consolidated Rubber Tire Co. v. Diamond Rubber Co., 226 Fed. 455 [aff 232 Fed. 475, 146 CCA 469]; Campbell Printing-Press, etc., Co. v. Manhattan R. Co., 49 Fed. 930; Whitney v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 48 Fed. 444; North American Iron-Works v. Fiske, 30 Fed. 622.

[a] Sales after notice.—Sales by defendant of infringing articles or devices after he has been given notice of the patent justifies an accounting. Ersted v. Willamette Iron, etc., Works, 28 F. (2d) 960; Atlas Floor Co. v. Robbins Mfg. Co., 239 Fed. 135, 152 CCA 177.

[b] Failure to file disclaimer does not disentitle plaintiff to an accounting. Novelty Glass Mfg. Co. v. Brookfield, 172 Fed. 221, 97 CCA 25.

[c] Avoiding accounting by offer of certain royalty.—Where it is plain defendants have infringed, but they have denied infringement until after the bringing of the suit, and then in their answer deny the validity of the patent and still deny infringement, they cannot avoid being subjected to the expense of an accounting by offering to pay the royalty on a certain number of the infringing articles which they admit having sold, together with the costs of the suit. Fisk v. Mahler, 54 Fed. 528.

[d] Purpose of accounting.—"Accountings for damages in suits for infringement are to avoid actions at law, and to close up all the rights of the parties in one suit." Van Kannell Revolving Door Co. v. Revolving Door, etc., Co., 293 Fed. 261, 262.

Scope of accounting directed by decree see infra § 637.

17. Sandusky Fdy., etc., Co. v. De Lavaud, 274 Fed. 607; Perkins Electric Switch Mfg. Co. v. Yost Electric Mfg. Co., 189 Fed. 625; Bergmann v. Macmillan, 17 Ch. D. 423. See Southern Textile Mach. Co. v. Fay Stocking Co., 259 Fed. 243, 170 CCA 311 (before any accounting is ordered for profits, as distinguished from damages, the trial court should be satisfied there is some theory of recovering profits plausible enough to justify an effort to establish it).

[a] In earlier cases (1) it was held that plaintiff was entitled to an accounting, even though he had introduced no evidence of profits and damages (Campbell Printing-Press, etc., Co. v. Manhattan R. Co., 49 Fed. 930; Andrews v. Creegan, 7 Fed. 477, 19 Blatchf. 113; Bullock Printing Press Co. v. Jones, 4 F. Cas. No. 2,132, 3 Bann. & A. 195), (2) as, for the purpose of ordering an accounting, they would be presumed from infringement (Campbell Printing-Press, etc., Co. v. Manhattan R. Co., supra; Andrews v. Creegan, supra).

18. Campbell Printing-Press, etc., Co. v. Manhattan R. Co., 49 Fed. 930; Allen v. Blunt, 1 F. Cas. No. 215, 1 Blatchf. 480, Fish. Pat. R. 303; Carew v. Boston Elastic Fabric Co., 5 F. Cas. No. 2,397, 3 Cliff. 356, 5 Fish. Pat. Cas. 90.

Effect of bankruptcy of defendant after reference to master see Bankruptcy § 28.

19. Hewes v. Gay, 11 F. (2d) 165;

[§ 637] (b) Scope. On a reference for an accounting in a patent infringement case, the master is to determine profits and damages[20] arising from defendant's[21] unauthorized manufacture, sale, or use of the patented invention in question,[22] including a reasonable royalty[23] where that measure of damages is applicable,[24] but not increased damages[25] which the court, under statutory authority may award.[26] The master is bound,[27] and the scope of the accounting is limited,[28] by the terms of the interlocutory decree as properly construed.[29] Generally speaking, the only question open for determination on the accounting is the amount to be recovered,[30] and no issue can be brought into the accounting unless its object or effect is to aid in determining that question.[31] The validity[32] and scope[33] of the patent are not to be determined, and therefore evidence of the prior art is not to be introduced at the accounting.[34] However, while questions of infringement determined by the interlocutory decree are not open to reconsideration on the accounting,[35] the master is to determine the extent of the infringement;[36] the account is not limited to the date of the decree,[37] but extends to the date of the hearing before the master,[38] or, as near as may be,[39] to the date of the master's report,[40] unless infringement has ceased[41] or complainant has sold his patent[42] prior to that time; the master may determine whether a new or modified construction adopted since the date of the interlocutory decree constitutes an infringement,[43] or, more accurately speaking,[44] the master may, by comparing the new and old constructions,[45] determine whether the new is substantially like the old[46] so as to come within

[a] Separate findings.—(1) Where evidence is introduced both as to damages and profits, it is proper for the master to report separate findings and conclusions as to each. Mast v. Superior Drill Co., 154 Fed. 45, 83 CCA 157. (2) The master should make findings as to damages shown, even though the profits awarded are adequate to compensate plaintiff. Christensen v. National Brake, etc., Co., 10 F. (2d) 856. (3) Plaintiff is entitled to make a choice between the two, at least according to some decisions. See supra § 618.

21. See cases infra this note.

[a] Liability of each defendant should be determined. Herring v. Gage, 12 F. Cas. No. 6,422, 3 Bann. & A. 396, 15 Blatchf. 124 [rev on other grounds 107 U. S. 640, 2 SCt 819, 27 L. ed. 601]; Tatham v. Lowber, 23 F. Cas. No. 13,765, 4 Blatchf. 86.

[b] Infringement by third person or corporation.—A decree in a suit against a corporation and individuals may be construed not to contemplate an accounting of profits derived, or arising from infringement, by another corporation in which the individual defendants are officers and stockholders. Davey Tree Expert Co. v. Frost, etc., Co., 300 Fed. 680; New York Grape Sugar Co. v. American Grape Sugar Co., 42 Fed. 455.

22. See cases infra this note.

[a] Improvement.—A decree directing an account of all the profits realized by defendant from the manufacture, use, or sale of a certain article is too broad where the patent is only for an improvement constituting a part of the article. Littlefield v. Perry, 21 Wall. (U. S.) 205, 22 L. ed. 577.

[b] Use of other patented machines.—(1) The accounting will not be extended so as to cover the use by defendant of other patented machines. Dunkley Co. v. Central California Canneries, 7 F. (2d) 972 [certiorari den 270 U. S. 646 mem, 40 SCt 347 mem, 70 L. ed. 778 mem]. (2) Presumption that later patented invention does not infringe see supra § 581.

the decree;[47] and it is at least within the discretion of the master,[48] subject to the supervision of the trial court,[49] to include in the accounting a tool which, although not mentioned in the evidence prior to the interlocutory decree, was adopted by defendant prior to the decree and was an equivalent of the tool which was adjudged to infringe. Also, where the giving of notice of the patent in compliance with statutory provisions[50] has been properly pleaded,[51] and evidence thereof has not been previously given, such evidence may be introduced on the accounting.[52]

Presenting question of scope to court. Where the master by his rulings limits the scope of the inquiry, the matter may properly be presented to the court for decision by a motion for instructions to the master.[53]

[§ 638] (c) Proceedings—aa. Before Master.[54] Pertinent federal equity rules[55] and practice which has received judicial approval[56] should be followed in proceedings before a master upon a reference for an accounting of profits and damages in an equitable suit for infringement of a patent. Thus the federal equity rule, providing that all parties accounting before a master shall bring in their respective accounts in the form of debtor and creditor,[57] applies to defendant,[58] although not to plaintiff,[59] on an accounting of profits and damages before a master in a suit for infringement of a patent, but the statement of account filed by defendant is sufficient if it conforms to what the courts deem proper practice under the rule.[60] While the statement of account filed by defendant performs only the functions of a pleading[61] and is not evidence,[62] yet where plaintiff is dissatisfied with the statement, his remedy is not to file any particular form of objections,[63] or to require any further statement from defendant,[64] but rather to examine defendant viva voce,[65] as provided by the pertinent federal equity rule.[66] A statement complying in terms with the rule should be accepted as the measure of profits[67] unless plaintiff proves that it is falsely stated,[68] in which case it seems that the court, either directly[69] or through the master,[70] may appoint a competent and disinterested accountant to cure defendant's default,[71] and the report of the accountant should stand unless it is promptly impeached for fraud[72] or gross inaccuracy;[73] and likewise it seems that an accountant may be appointed where defendant's statement is not only false in substance, but also insufficient in form.[74] Defendant should not be allowed to introduce testimony contradicting the statement.[75] The master is not called upon to suggest how profits and dam-

[a] Practice approved.—"The practice which we approve is this: The master appoints a day for proceeding with the reference, and gives notice, by mail or otherwise, to the parties or their solicitors. The solicitor should be notified, whether the party is or not; although, probably, under rule 75 [present rule 60], notice to the party is a good notice. If defendant does not appear, the master proceeds ex parte and makes out the profits and damages, if he can, from the evidence produced by plaintiff. If it appears that an account of profits is necessary to a just decision of the cause, and is desired by plaintiff, he makes an order that defendant furnish an account by a certain day, and adjourns the hearing to that day. Defendant should be served personally with a notice of this adjournment, and of the order to produce his account, if it is intended to move for an attachment in case he fails to appear. The service may be made by any disinterested person, and need not be by the marshal. If defendant then fails to appear and account, he will be in contempt." Kerosene Lamp-Heater Co. v. Fisher, 1 Fed. 91, 92.

[b] Practice not approved.—"The mode of proceeding which we do not approve, is for the plaintiff to take out a notice, in the first instance, before any hearing has been or can lawfully be had, requiring the defendant to furnish an account by a certain day on pain of punishment for contempt. We doubt the power of the master to make such an order upon a mere inspection of the record, and we consider the practice inexpedient if it is lawful." Kerosene Lamp-Heater Co. v. Fisher, 1 Fed. 91, 92.

[a] Proper practice.—"In my judgment the proper practice under the rule requires the accounting party in a patent infringing accounting at the outset merely to file such account in debtor or creditor form as, in the light of the principles and express directions of the decree, will exhibit the matters which are the subject of the accounting, namely, on the one hand the sums chargeable, the manufacture and sales, the amounts received, and the like, all in such detail as would be required in an account thereof rendered for any other purpose; and on the other hand, in detail, the items of credit or offset, such as cost of material, manufacturing cost, and the like, to the end that the statement as a whole will be an account showing gains and profits, and such as will furnish a basis for further proceeding in case the adversary is not satisfied therewith. I know of no reason why an accounting party in a patent suit should be called upon, in advance, to make detailed calculations to furnish statements whose effect is or will be evidentiary only." ages may be proved,[76] nor is he required to report oral evidence when not requested to do so at the time;[77] and he may properly refuse to reopen the accounting where sufficient grounds for such action are not shown.[78]

[§ 639] bb. After Filing of Master's Report. While the court may set aside the report of the master for manifest error of law or fact,[79] and refer the case back to him for further proceedings,[80] it will not take this action when it is not necessary in order to accomplish justice.[81] The findings and conclusions of the master upon matters of fact involving the weighing of conflicting testimony have every reasonable presumption in their favor[82] and will not be set aside or modified unless error or mistake clearly appears.[83] The proper mode of testing the sufficiency of the report is by exceptions pointing out error.[84] Upon the hearing of exceptions to the report, or of a motion to confirm or reject the report, questions previously decided by the court in the same case,[85] such as the validity of the patent,[86] matters of infringement,[87] and the rule of damages,[88] are not open to reconsideration; and matters agreed upon by the parties as exhibited and set forth in statements by their accountants, introduced in evidence before the master, and not controverted before the court, will be accepted by the court as correct.[89]

On subsequent accounting the evidence introduced on the first accounting may be used,[90] and further evidence may be introduced[91] and accorded its proper probative value,[92] even though it is in conflict with that introduced on the first accounting.[93]

[§ 640] f. Dismissal[94]—(1) Voluntary Dismissal. Plaintiff in a patent infringement suit has a right voluntarily to dismiss the bill[95] without prejudice[96] upon the payment of costs[97] or such other lawful terms as the court may deem proper to impose,[98] unless the dismissal would prejudice defendant[99] and the prejudice would consist of something

[a] Expense in preparing defense. —Where defendant has afforded complainant every opportunity to examine the former's engineers, super-

other than the mere prospect of being harassed and vexed by future litigation of the same kind.[1]

[§ 641] (2) Involuntary Dismissal[2]—(a) Before Final Hearing. Ordinarily, a motion to dismiss a bill in equity for infringement of a patent on the ground that it fails to state a cause of action will be overruled unless it is absolutely clear that, taking all the allegations to be true, the bill must be dismissed at the hearing;[3] but it is held that, although the court is of the opinion that as a matter of law a motion to dismiss the bill on the ground that it shows on its face that plaintiff is without sufficient interest to maintain the suit should be overruled, yet the court may grant the motion in order that the question of law may be determined by the circuit court of appeals before the final hearing.[4] An objection which is at the most only an assertion that there will be a variance will not be determined on a motion to dismiss the bill before proofs have been offered.[5]

For invalidity of patent on its face. Where the patent is void on its face, the court may and should dismiss the bill either on a motion to dismiss on this ground[6] or on its own initiative,[7] regardless of whether or not the defense or objection is presented by answer or otherwise.[8] However, a motion to dismiss on this ground will not be sustained unless, on the face of the patent,[9] and by resort to matters of common and general knowledge[10] of which the court may take judicial notice,[11] the invalidity of the patent is clear and obvious[12] to such an extent that validity could not be established by any competent evidence which might be offered in support thereof.[13]

On answers to interrogatories. Where the validity of the patent is not involved, a bill sufficient on its face to charge infringement will not be dismissed on motion after plaintiff has answered interrogatories, unless from the answers to the interrogatories it so clearly appears that defendant did not infringe the patent that the court can say that under no admissible evidence which might by any possibility exist can the conclusion of noninfringement be avoided.[14]

On allegations in answer. An allegation in the answer of facts showing the triviality or limited extent of the infringement is not ground for dismissal of the bill on motion where plaintiff does not admit the facts alleged.[15]

On stipulations. Lack of jurisdiction on account of the noncommission by defendant of acts of infringement in the district wherein the suit is brought intendents, and foremen with a view to discovering infringement, and has gone to great trouble and expense to prepare his defense, complainant will not be given leave to withdraw or discontinue the action without prejudice to a new suit at any time when he can obtain more specific and complete information of defendant's methods of manufacture. Churchward International Steel Co. v. Carnegie Steel Co., 286 Fed. 158.

[b] Where alleged infringement has been disproved, an application for dismissal without prejudice, as to one of the defendants, will be denied. Archer v. Arnd, 31 Fed. 475 [aff 140 U. S. 668, 11 SCt 1015, 35 L. ed. 599].

[a] Design patents.—In a case of a simple design patent, where the mere inspection of the patent is all that would be necessary for the determination of its validity on final hearing, a motion to dismiss the bill on the ground that the patent is void on its face for lack of invention is to be encouraged, as the practice of presenting the question of validity by motion saves time and expense and tends to prompt disposition of the litigation. may not be determined on a motion to dismiss and a stipulation as to the sole acts done by defendant in the district which are claimed by plaintiff to be infringing acts, where extraneous evidence is necessary to aid the court in arriving at a conclusion.[16]

On affidavits. A motion to dismiss before the hearing will not be granted where it is based upon affidavits as to facts going to the merits of the case.[17]

On showing made for preliminary injunction. A motion to dismiss the bill on the ground that, as shown by the record made on application for an injunction pendente lite, the patent is void for anticipation or want of novelty will not be granted except in a clear case.[18] On the other hand, where motions for a temporary injunction and to dismiss the bill are considered together, the motion to dismiss should be granted where it is apparent from a comparison of plaintiff's patent and defendant's device that there is no infringement,[19] and that nothing further respecting infringement can be adduced at the final hearing.[20]

[§ 642] (b) At Final Hearing. The bill must be dismissed where infringement has been put in issue by the pleadings and there is no proof thereof at the hearing.[21] Also, the bill will be dismissed where, so far as appears from the bill and proofs, plaintiff has no interest in the patent upon which the suit is founded.[22] The bill may be dismissed without prejudice where a failure of proof may be attributable to a slip in practice,[23] or where the suit is upon two patents and the dismissal is as to one which the court deems it unnecessary to consider.[24] Where a court of equity declines to grant the relief sought because the right of plaintiff is not clear, it may provide that the cause stand over a reasonable time for the bringing of an action at law,[25] and that the bill be dismissed if the final judgment in the action at law is in favor of defendant[26] or such action is not brought within a reasonable time[27] and prosecuted with reasonable diligence.[28]

At close of plaintiff's proofs. The court may, in its discretion, permit defendant at the close of plaintiff's proofs to present by a motion to dismiss a jurisdictional question,[29] or a question of the legal sufficiency of the proof of title to the patent,[30] without requiring defendant to abide by the case as then made in the event that his motion shall be overruled; but a motion, made at this stage of the proceedings, to dismiss on the ground that the proofs are insufficient to establish infringement will be overruled[31] without considering the merits.[32]

[§ 643] g. Operation and Effect[33]—(1) In General. A decision sustaining a patent upon a differentiation from the prior art does not authorize the successful party to gather to himself a monopoly of what was old when he entered the field.[34] A final adjudication declaring a patent invalid relieves a licensee from all liability for royalties claimed to have been earned after he repudiated his license prior to the adjudication.[35]

[§ 644] (2) As to Parties and Privies. The doctrine of res judicata[36] is fully applicable to cases of patent infringement;[37] and a final decision by a court of competent jurisdiction in a suit on letters patent is conclusive upon, and as between, the parties to the suit and their privies,[38] as to all ques-

[a] Person conducting defense.—(1) A person is bound by the decision in a patent infringement suit where, although not a party to the suit, he openly, avowedly, and with the knowledge of plaintiff, assumed, controlled, and conducted, or participated in, the defense at his own cost and for his own interest (Beyer Co.

tions, issues, or matters which were settled and disposed of thereby,[39] but not as to other matters.[40]

Interlocutory decree adjudging a patent to be valid and infringed, awarding a permanent injunction and referring the cause to a master for an accounting of profits and damages, is not res judicata as to validity and infringement of the patent,[41] but the rule is otherwise as to an interlocutory decree which has ripened into a final decree,[42] a decree of the circuit court of appeals determining questions of validity and infringement on an appeal from an interlocutory decree,[43] or a subsequent decree of the lower court entered in pursuance of the mandate of the appellate court.[44]

Dismissal of a suit without prejudice is not a bar to a second suit;[45] nor is a decree dismissing the bill for failure to prove infringement a bar to another suit for subsequent infringement.[46]

Decree pro confesso or by consent is conclusive between the parties as to all matters covered thereby,[47] but not as to other matters,[48] nor, it is held, as between defendant and an assignee of plaintiff.[49]

Protection of right by injunction. A manufacturer who was successful in a suit against him for infringement is entitled to an injunction restraining plaintiff from prosecuting a suit against a customer of defendant for infringement consisting of the use of the article involved in the former suit,[50]

v. Fleischmann Co., 15 F. (2d) 465; Murphy Wall Bed Co. v. Pacific Spring Bed Co., 295 Fed. 745; Dicks Press Guard Mfg. Co. v. Bowen, 229 Fed. 193; Gilchrist Co. v. (2d) 599); (4) but the defense of prior adjudication is not available to a defendant, dismissed from a suit for infringement on his own application, on the ground that he employed counsel and defrayed the costs of the defense made by his codefendant, unless it appears by clear and definite evidence that such fact was known to plaintiff (Singer Mfg. Co. v. Cramer, 109 Fed. 652, 48 CCA 588 [rev on other grounds 192 U. S. 265, 24 SCt 291, 48 L. ed. 437]).

[b] Patent subsequently reissued.—A decision on an original patent is res judicata in a subsequent suit between the same parties on a reissued patent, in so far as the invention or claims set forth in the two patents are identical. Del Turco v. Traitel Marble Co., 25 F. (2d) 308; Universal Adding Mach. Co. v. Comptograph Co., 161 Fed. 365; Cammeyer v. Newton, 4 F. Cas. No. 2,344, 4 Bann. & A. 159. Compare Frink Co. v. Erikson, 20 F. (2d) 707, 712 [vacating decree 16 F. (2d) 495] (a decree adjudging the original patent invalid is not a bar to a suit upon the reissue patent, as "a decision as to the validity or invalidity of the reissue patent requires a determination of other questions than the mere validity or invalidity of the original patent").

[a] Rule applied.—(1) A matter concerning which the court made remarks but which was not raised by the pleadings or record is not res judicata. Bassick Mfg. Co. v. Larkin Automotive Parts Co., 19 F. (2d) 939 [aff 19 F. (2d) 944]. (2) The question of a limitation of patent claims is not res judicata because of an opinion expressed by the court as to such limitation in a prior suit between the parties, where the issues and the alleged infringing device were not the same as in a later suit, and where such opinion was not determinative of the suit. Imperial Mach., etc., Corp. v. American Mach. Co., 276 Fed. 436. (3) The decision in a suit for infringement of one patent does not prevent the maintenance of another suit between the same parties for infringement of another patent. Bassick Mfg. Co. v. Larkin Automotive Parts Co., 23 F. (2d) 92 (subsequent suit by plaintiff for infringement by same device); Victor Talking Mach. Co. v. American Graphophone Co., 189 Fed. 359 [aff 190 Fed. 1023, 111 CCA 675] (subsequent suit for infringement of patent granted to defendant for one of the steps included in the process patent involved in the former suit); Leonard v. Simplex Electric Heating Co., 145 Fed. 946 (subsequent suit by defendant for infringement of patent, the validity of which was not in issue in the former suit). (4) A decision as to infringement by a certain device, machine or structure is not conclusive as to infringement by a different device or structure. U. S. Rubber Co. v. I. T. S. Rubber Co., 288 Fed. 786 [rev 278 Fed. 975, and certiorari den 262 U. S. 748 mem, 43 SCt 523 mem, 67 L. ed. 1213 mem]; T. L. Smith Co. v. Cement Tile Mach. Brooklyn Rapid Transit Co., 238 Fed. 172, 176, 151 CCA 248. (6) A decision in a prior suit between the same parties or their privies that a certain machine had not at a particular time been so adjusted and used as to infringe is not res judicata of the question of whether or not it is capable of being so adjusted by slight changes as to infringe when in use. Sanitary Street Flushing Mach. Co. v. Amsterdam, 225 Fed. 389 [aff 229 Fed. 421, 143 CCA 541].

[a] Interlocutory decree pro confesso (1) does not become binding as an estoppel unless, and until, a final decree is entered, but where the pro confesso decree embodies a determination of infringement, and is never revoked, defendant is bound by it, from the date of its entry, as to the question of infringement. S. 554 mem, 39 SCt 10 mem, 63 L. ed. 419 mem]; Van Epps v. International Paper Co., 124 Fed. 542), (4) nor is it a bar to a suit against him (Kryptok Co. v. Stead Lens Co., 190 Fed. 767, 111 CCA 495, 39 LRANS 1), (5) unless full profits and damages have been recovered from, and paid by, the manufacturer (see infra § 646). (6) A decree in favor of a manufacturer in a suit against him does not operate as an estoppel in favor of his customer. Wenborne-Karpen Dryer Co. v. Dort Motor Car Co., 14 F. (2d) 378 [rev 300 Fed. 404]; Hurd v. Woodward Co., 190 Fed. 28. And see Woodward Co. v. Hurd, 232 U. S. 428, 34 SCt 408, 58 L. ed. 670 (a person who purchases from various other persons the different parts of a patented combination and sells all of them to his customers to be united into the patented structure by the latter is not immune from a suit against him as a contributory infringer by reason of a prior decree in favor of the manufacturer of one of the parts); Stoehrer v. Glen Echo Park Co., 15 F. (2d) 558 (recognizing the rule, but holding that a dismissal of the bill was proper where the manufacturer intervened and the alleged infringing device was substantially furnished by him).

[a] Rule applied (1) to decisions

ous[64] or the evidence in the second suit is materially different[65] or is so different as to lead to a different conclusion.[66] The obligation to follow the decisions of other courts in patent causes increases in proportion to the number of courts which have passed upon the same question and arrived at the same conclusion.[67]

Decision in suit by defendant upon another patent is not binding upon plaintiff where he was not a party or privy to the suit.[68]

[§ 646] (4) Recovery of Profits and Damages. A recovery of the profits for the use of a patented article does not vest the title in defendant;[69] the recovery of damages for past infringement does not give the infringer the right to continue the infringement thereafter;[70] and a recovery from a vendor may not, under the circumstances, release the vendee from liability.[71] While the recovery of full compensation for the use of a particular machine may operate to release it from the monopoly,[72] and the recovery of profits and damages from the manufacturer of an infringing machine vests the right or title to the use in the purchaser of the article[73] and debars the owner of the patent from recovering from a user for the use thereof,[74] the latter rule cannot be properly applied unless the purchaser was using the same patented article as that involved in the suit between the owner of the patent and the

as to the validity of the patent (Rousso v. Elco Towel Cabinet Co., 28 F. (2d) 300; Meurer Steel Barrel Co., Inc. v. Draper Mfg. Co., 260 Fed. 410; Schmeiser Mfg. Co. v. [a] Scope of inquiry.—When a patent has once been sustained by an appellate court, a subordinate court, dealing subsequently with the same patent, inquires first whether the second record contains anything not before the appellate court in the prior litigation, and, if it finds something new, inquires next whether the new matter is of such a character that it may fairly be supposed that the appellate court would have reached a different conclusion, had it been advised of its existence. infringing manufacturer,[75] the user was a vendee of the manufacturer,[76] and full compensation was not only recovered from the manufacturer,[77] but was also actually paid.[78]

[§ 647] 12. Reopening or Rehearing.[79] In an equitable suit for infringement of a patent, the court may reopen the case and grant a rehearing,[80] but it is under no compulsion to do so,[81] as the granting or refusing of an application therefor rests in the discretion of the court,[82] to be exercised according to the facts of each case[83] and the effect which the granting or refusal of the application will have on the rights of the parties respectively;[84] and, as a rule, a rehearing will not be granted unless there are exceptional circumstances.[85]

Newly discovered evidence. While, upon a proper showing, a rehearing may be granted upon the ground of newly discovered evidence,[86] it will not be granted upon this ground where, so far as appears, the evidence alleged to be newly discovered was accessible at the time of the original hearing and, by the exercise of reasonable diligence, could have been produced at such hearing,[87] there was laches or unreasonable delay in applying for a reopening or rehearing after discovering the evidence,[88] or the new evidence, if presented at the original hearing, would not have changed the result or decision.[89]

Conditions. As a condition of granting a rehearing the court may require the moving party to pay expenses of the adverse party,[90] or give an undertaking to pay the expense of additional testimony.[91]

[§ 648] 13. Review—a. In General—(1) By Circuit Court of Appeals.[92] Under general statutory provisions an appeal may be taken to the circuit court of appeals from any final decree in a patent suit.[93] Also, under general statutory provisions, an appeal may be taken to the circuit court of appeals from an interlocutory order or decree granting, continuing, modifying, refusing, or dissolving, or refusing to modify or dissolve, an injunction;[94] and a statute expressly relating to patent infringe-Stafford Co., 255 Fed. 554, 166 CCA 622).

Appeals to circuit court of appeals from final decrees generally see Federal Courts §§ 327, 331.

94. U. S. Code tit 28 § 227.

[a] Decrees held to be interlocutory within the meaning of the statute include a decree: (1) Granting an injunction and referring the cause to the master for an accounting. See

ment suits provides for the taking of an appeal to the circuit court of appeals from a decree which is final except for the ordering of an accounting.[95] The refusal of various matters, such as a rehearing,[96] permission to file a disclaimer after the decision,[97] leave to file a supplemental bill,[98] or to adjudge defendant guilty of contempt for violating an injunction,[99] is not appealable, nor will an appeal be allowed to settle costs.[1] Formerly an appeal did not lie from an interlocutory decree granting an accounting only for infringement of an expired patent,[2] but under subsequent legislation[3] the rule is otherwise.[4]

Who may appeal. A licensee who joins the patentee with him as plaintiff may appeal without the consent of the patentee.[5]

Time for appeal or writ of error. A longer time is allowed by the statute for the taking of appeals from final decrees[6] than for taking appeals from other decrees,[7] and an appeal from a particular decree may be taken within,[8] and only within,[9] the time limited by the statute applicable thereto. Questions arising on an accounting will be reviewed only after the entry of a final decree.[10] An order adjudging defendant guilty of contempt for violation of an injunction and imposing a fine on him purely as compensation to plaintiff is not appealable until after the final decree;[11] but where a fine is imposed partly as compensation to plaintiff and partly as punishment, a writ of error may be obtained immediately.[12]

Record on appeal should comply with the pertinent federal equity rules[13] and be limited to matters before the trial court at the time of the order or decree from which the appeal is taken.[14] Stipulations of the parties as to the contents of the record will not necessarily be given effect.[15]

Assignments of error on appeal in patent causes, where the error complained of consists in holding the patent valid or invalid,[16] or infringed or not infringed,[17] may be more general than in ordinary cases.[18]

Effect of appeal; supersedeas. During the pendency of an appeal from an interlocutory decree granting an injunction the trial court may enter such orders as are purely administrative in character,[19] but it is without power to enter a final decree.[20] While a supersedeas on appeal may be granted,[21] it will be granted only under special circumstances.[22] It is held that a supersedeas is effective as authority to defendant to continue his business in respect of the alleged infringing article,[23] and that plaintiff may be restrained from sending circulars to defendant's customers warning them against purchasing defendant's goods,[24] but it is also held that the supersedeas does not affect the right of plaintiff to bring suits against defendant's customers pending the appeal.[25]

Dismissal of appeal. Where the patent has expired, an appeal from an interlocutory decree granting an injunction will be dismissed.[26] Also the appeal may be dismissed for the purpose of allowing Federal Courts § 332 note 95 [b]. (2) Dismissing a bill of revivor as to injunction. Duplex Printing Press Co. v. Hoe, 15 F. (2d) 362 (dismissal is, in legal effect, equivalent to refusal of injunction).

the reopening of the case for the presentation of newly discovered evidence.[27] The circuit court of appeals should not dismiss an appeal from an interlocutory order granting an injunction because the order was made pro forma,[28] the proper procedure in such case being to reverse and remand for further proceedings.[29] One of several appellants cannot dismiss an appeal.[30]

In action at law. Any final judgment at law in a patent suit may be reviewed by the circuit court of appeals by writ of error.[31]

[§ 649] (2) By Supreme Court. The judgment or decree of the circuit court of appeals in a case arising under the patent laws is final[32] and not reviewable by the supreme court except by certification by the court of appeals[33] or by writ of certiorari by the supreme court.[34] The United States supreme court may review a decision by a state court,[35] or by a federal district court,[36] upon the question whether or not a suit arises under the patent laws of the United States so as to be within the exclusive jurisdiction of the federal courts;[37] and it may also review a decision by a particular federal district court that a suit for infringement of a patent is or is not instituted in the proper district.[38]

[§ 650] b. Scope of Review; Determination and Disposition of Cause—(1) In General. On appeal in a suit for infringement of a patent, the circuit court of appeals, in a sense, hears the case de novo,[39] but nevertheless it hears the case as a reviewing, rather than as a trial, court,[40] and it will not consider objections made for the first time on appeal.[41] The appellate court may consider matters which appear in the record,[42] but it will not admit[43] or strike out[44] evidence, review any question requiring a consideration of evidence which is not before it,[45] or review a portion of a decree from which no appeal has been taken.[46] A presumption in favor of the correctness of the decree of the lower court,[47] and the findings of the master[48] which have been approved by the lower court,[49] will be indulged on appeal.[50] Also a finding or determination of the trial court,[51] or a finding of the master[52] which has been approved or concurred in by the trial court,[53] as to a question of fact depending upon conflict-

[b] Matters bearing upon validity or construction of patent.—(1) In reviewing a decree holding the patent invalid, the appellate court is not limited to the particular ground upon which the lower court based its decision (U. S. Consolidated Seeded Raisin Co. v. Selma Fruit Co., 195 Fed. 264, 115 CCA 234); (2) and although the lower court held the patent to have been anticipated by only one other patent, the court on appeal may consider the entire prior art as disclosed by the whole record (Backstay Mach., etc., Co. v. Hamilton, 262 Fed. 411 [certiorari den 253 U. S. 488 mem, 40 SCt 485 mem, 64 L. ed. 1026 mem]). (3) Even though, in an action for the infringement of two patents, the action is dismissed as to one, that patent may otherwise be sufficiently before the appellate court to permit a consideration of it on the question of anticipation of the other patented invention. R. Herschel Mfg. Co. v. Great States Corp., 26 F. (2d) 362. (4) Patents set up in the answer as a part of the prior art, printed and indexed in the record on appeal, and referred to in the briefs, and in relation to which witnesses were examined, all without objection, will not be excluded from consideration by the appellate court because they were not formally marked as exhibits by the examiner. Smyth Mfg. Co. v. Sheridan, 149 Fed. 208, 79 CCA 166. (5) However, where the appellate court is clearly of opinion that patent of plaintiff was anticipated by one of several patents alleged by defendant to be anticipations, it is unnecessary for the court to consider the other references. ing evidence or the credibility of witnesses, will not be disturbed on appeal unless it is clearly erroneous;[54] but the rule does not apply to the determination of a question which is not purely one of fact,[55] nor does it make the determination of the lower court unassailable[56] so as, in effect, to exclude review and reversal,[57] and it need not be applied where it would result in a miscarriage of justice.[58] In the United States supreme court the rule against disturbing a finding of fact which is not clearly erroneous[59] is applicable where a finding of the district court has been approved by the circuit court of appeals,[60] but it does not apply to its full extent where a finding of the district court has been disapproved by the cir uit court of appeals[61] and is also contrary to a conclusion reached by the trial court in another case upon the same issue and evidence.[62] A refusal to increase damages is so far a matter of discretion[63] that it will not be disturbed on appeal.[64] The reviewing court will make such disposition of the cause as is appropriate in the particular case.[65] Where the circuit court of appeals adjudges certain claims valid and infringed, it should make findings that the remaining claims are either invalid or not infringed.[66]

In action at law. On a writ of error in an action at law, the circuit court of appeals will not review facts[67] or consider an objection to the validity of the patent which was not pleaded or relied on in the trial court,[68] but it may consider patents or records which, although introduced in evidence, were, by stipulation of the parties, presented to, and considered by, the lower court on a motion for a directed verdict.[69] Where the trial court sitting without a jury held certain claims not to disclose patentable novelty and other claims not to be infringed, and the latter claims disclose nothing different from the former claims, it seems that the whole cause will not be sent back for a new trial merely because the trial court made no separate specific findings as to the nonpatentability of the latter claims.[70]

[§ 651] (2) On Appeal from Order or Decree as to Injunction. An appeal from an interlocutory decree granting or refusing to grant an injunction does not raise any question as to damages or an accounting,[71] and on such appeal the circuit court of appeals will not consider matters which were not mentioned in the bill,[72] presented to, or argued before, the lower court,[73] or referred to in the de-

[a] Evidence insufficient in degree.—"In patent litigation the mere fact that there is a serious conflict in the evidence as to prior public use, and that the District Court has made its findings in favor of defendants in conformity to evidence on that issue, does not present an instance where the appellate court must adopt the findings of the trial judge. An anticipation must be proven by evidence so cogent as to leave no reasonable doubt in the minds of the court, and, if the evidence in support of the issue fail to measure up to that standard, the law will not uphold a conclusion that prior use has been proven." [a] Decree will not be reversed (1) because the proof shows that the infringing machine was sold by a concern doing business under a different name and style from that of the partnership of defendants as alleged in the bill, where it also fairly shows that the defendants were the proprietors of such concern, and the fact that they made the sale was not contested in the trial court. cree.[74] In disposing of the cause, or such part of it as is before the appellate court, due regard may and should be given to the scope of the appeal and the status of the proceedings.[75]

Preliminary injunction. On an appeal from an interlocutory order granting or refusing to grant or dissolve a preliminary injunction against infringement of a patent, the appellate court will ordinarily review only the propriety of the action of the lower court in granting or refusing the injunction,[76] and will reverse the order only for an abuse of discretion.[77] While the reviewing court may direct the dismissal of the bill where it is so clearly devoid of equity, on account of invalidity or noninfringement of the patent, that no amendment thereof or additional evidence could effect a different result on final hearing,[78] it will not take such action upon a meager record where it might result in injustice.[79] The appellate court should examine the interlocutory decision in the light of the matters presented to the lower court,[80] in so far as they are incorporated in the record.[81] Where an injunction was granted upon the strength of a prior adjudication, and there is no controlling reason for disregarding such adjudication,[82] it will be accorded the same weight by the appellate court as it was entitled to in the lower court;[83] but where the adjudication is that of a court of another circuit, the appellate court is not bound thereby,[84] and it is at liberty to dispose of the questions of law according to its own convictions.[85] The prior adjudication is not, of course, the subject of the appeal[86] and is not to be reviewed as on a direct appeal therefrom.[87] On certiorari to a circuit court of appeals to review an affirmance of an order granting a preliminary injunction, the supreme court will not ordinarily pass upon questions of fact which were not passed upon

[a] Appeal from pro forma order.—(1) Where an interlocutory order granting an injunction was made pro forma to the end that an appeal might be prosecuted, the circuit court of appeals is not required to consider the order as one properly before it on the merits (Ex p. Harley-Davidson Motor Co., 259 U. S. 414, 42 SCt 527, 66 L. ed. 996), (2) and it may reverse and remand the cause for further proceedings in accordance with law (Ex p. Harley-Davidson Motor Co., supra), (3) but it should not dismiss the appeal (see supra § 648).

[b] Instructions to lower court on affirmance.—On affirmance of an interlocutory decree granting an injunction as to some of the claims of the patent, the circuit court of appeals will not instruct the lower court as to the necessity of the filing of a disclaimer by plaintiff as to other claims which have been held invalid by the lower court. [a] Appellate court is reluctant (1) to disturb an order of the lower court relative to a temporary injunction in a suit for infringement of a patent (Ottawa, etc., Power, etc., Co., Ltd. v. Murphy, 15 Que. K. B. 230), (2) especially where, in case an injunction was granted, plaintiff has furnished ample security to indemnify defendant against any loss resulting from erroneous issuance of the injunction (Stearns-Roger Mfg. Co. v. Brown, 114 Fed. 939, 52 CCA 559), (3) or where, in case an injunction was refused, the patent is new and unadjudicated (National Cash Register Co. v. Remington Arms Co., 286 Fed. 367 [aff 283 Fed. 196]).

by the lower court.[88]

Permanent injunction. On appeal from an interlocutory decree which was rendered after a full hearing and which adjudged the patent valid and infringed, granted a permanent injunction and ordered an accounting of profits and damages, the circuit court of appeals may review the case on the merits,[89] at least where appellee does not object;[90] and where it is of the opinion that the bill has no equity to support it, it may render or direct a final decree dismissing the bill;[91] but it cannot render a final decree for plaintiff.[92] On appeal from an order denying a motion to suspend a permanent injunction against infringement, as applied to a new device, the appellate court may determine whether the new device infringes.[93]

Supplementary injunction. An order denying a motion for a supplementary injunction is reviewable only for an abuse of discretion,[94] and it will be affirmed where plaintiff, by his attitude, prevented the trial court from considering the merits of the motion.[95]

[§ 652] c. Proceedings after Decision on Appeal. Where a disclaimer is filed after affirmance of a decree dismissing the bill, the appellate court may, before issuance of the mandate, authorize the enforcement of any equities arising under the disclaimer,[96] but it will not reopen the case or grant a rehearing where, notwithstanding the disclaimer, noninfringement furnishes ample support for dismissal of the bill,[97] and, generally speaking, the appellate court will not, after affirmance of the decree of the lower court, grant a rehearing where proper grounds therefor are not shown.[98] After the cause has been decided on appeal and remanded, the subsequent action of the lower court is controlled by the mandate,[99] or at least the lower court should not violate the mandate,[1] but it may take steps not inconsistent therewith.[2] While, after remand, the lower court cannot grant a rehearing without leave or permission of the appellate court,[3] the appellate court may, in its discretion,[4] grant[5] or deny[6] leave to apply to the lower court for a rehearing, and where leave has been so granted, the lower court may, in its discretion,[7] grant[8] or deny[9] the application.

On subsequent appeal in the same case, the appellate court will consider and review only matters properly within the scope of that appeal,[10] and it will not disturb a ruling made on the prior appeal.[11]

[§ 653] 14. Costs[12]—a. In Actions at Law. In an action at law for infringement of a patent, plaintiff is entitled to costs where a verdict has been rendered in his favor[13] for any amount,[14] even though the court does not exercise its statutory authority to increase the damages awarded by the jury.[15] In an action falling within the statute relating to disclaimers, plaintiff is not entitled to costs unless he filed a disclaimer prior to the commencement of the action;[16] but the fact that he filed a disclaimer since the verdict does not necessarily disentitle him to costs,[17] as the verdict may be upon, and in affirmance of the validity of, all the claims of the patent[18] or a disclaimer may be unnecessary.[19] Where one or more statutory defenses are alleged by, and found for, defendant, he is entitled to costs.[20] The expense of obtaining copies of patents from the patent office is not taxable as costs.[21]

[§ 654] b. In Suits in Equity[22]—(1) In General. In a suit in equity for infringement of a patent, costs are largely in the discretion of the trial court,[23] and, in the exercise of this discretion, they may be equitably divided or apportioned between the parties,[24] but only in rare and exceptional cases will the court apportion liability for costs among several defendants in accordance with the respective participation of each in the infringement.[25] Ordinarily costs will be awarded to the successful party,[26] unless there are special circumstances which render this unjust.[27] Where an execution for costs is returned unsatisfied, a receiver will not be appointed to take possession of the patent.[28]

Security for costs need not be given by plaintiff.[29] Treble costs may be allowed in Canada.[30]

[§ 655] (2) Partial or Divided Success. Where a party, in an equitable suit for infringement of a patent, is successful only in part, the court, in its discretion,[31] may award costs to him,[32] award no costs,[33] or divide the costs.[34]

As to actions. Where two cases between the same parties are heard upon the same testimony, and plaintiff obtains a decree in one case and defendant in another, the court may allow costs in each case to the recovering party for all but the evidence[35] and disallow costs for that in both cases.[36]

As to patents. Where plaintiff, suing for the infringement of two or more patents, succeeds as to some and is defeated as to others, the costs are in the discretion of the court[37] and are to be awarded according to the circumstances of the case.[38] The court may award plaintiff full costs,[39] award costs to neither party[40] or apportion the costs[41] according to the number of patents as to which each party is successful.[42]

As to claims. Where plaintiff is successful as to some, and unsuccessful as to other, claims sued upon on, it is ordinarily proper to apportion the costs,[43] or even to award plaintiff full costs;[44] and where there is a recovery upon some claims, it is proper not to dismiss the bill with costs as to other claims withdrawn before the entry of the decree.[45] However, where some of the claims sued on are void, costs for plaintiff are usually refused, although the decree is in his favor upon other claims.[46] Indeed, where the statute relating to disclaimers[47] is applicable, plaintiff cannot be allowed any costs unless a proper disclaimer was filed prior to the commencement of the suit;[48] but this rule applies only to the claims in issue in the suit,[49] and costs on appeal are not affected by a failure to file a disclaimer before institution of the suit.[50] Where only a part of the claims of the patent were in issue, but the decree, drawn by the attorney of the successful party, covers all the claims, the appellate court, on modifying the decree, may deny costs of appeal to both parties[51] or it may order each to pay one half of such costs.[52]

Harris, 168 Fed. 279, 93 CCA 581 [aff 162 Fed. 160] (allowing defendant costs as to the patent concerning which he was successful).

[§ 656] (3) Particular Items. The ordinary rules as to what constitute taxable costs[53] apply in an equitable suit for infringement of a patent.[54]

Expenses.[55] The expense of obtaining drawings[56] and photographs,[57] but not the expense of obtaining copies of patents,[58] may be taxed as costs. Also, the expense of printing the record is taxable as a part of the costs where the printing is required by a rule of court[59] or by an established practice having all the force of a rule of court.[60]

Allowance for travel by a witness may be properly taxed as costs;[61] but the rule is otherwise as to a travel allowance for a party attending the trial to assist in the defense without testifying.[62]

Issues raised by particulars of objections. Under statutes[63] and rules of court[64] in England, and the construction placed thereon, where the action proceeds to trial, no costs are allowed in respect of issues raised in the particulars of objections unless the particulars are certified by the court to have been proved or to have been reasonable and proper;[65] but a certificate is not necessary where the action is discontinued,[66] and in such case the costs of issues raised by particulars of objections are within the discretion of the taxing master.[67]

Solicitor and client costs. An English statute providing that, where it is certified in one action that the validity of the patent came in question, defendant in a subsequent successful action for infringement shall be liable for solicitor and client costs[68] has been given effect only in so far as applicable.[69]

Motion in open court for judgment. Although defendant has consented to an order for an injunction, plaintiff is entitled to the ordinary costs of a motion in open court for judgment,[70] and is not limited to the costs of an application in chambers.[71]

Accounting. While the costs of an accounting in a suit for infringement of a patent are taxable,[72] the allowance of such costs rests in the discretion of the court[73] and each case must be disposed of upon its own merits.[74] Each party should, in the first instance, pay the costs and expenses made by him as the proceeding goes forward[75] and leave the question of allowance to subsequent determination.[76] The costs of the reference and of the proceedings thereunder should be taxed against plaintiff where the decree against defendant is reversed and a final decree is rendered in his favor.[77] Also it is a general rule of practice to tax such costs against plaintiff where, although the final decree is in his favor, he is awarded only nominal damages or nominal profits and damages;[78] but in view of the circumstances of the particular case,[79] and in the exercise of its discretion,[80] the court may impose such costs upon defendant[81] or divide them equally between the parties.[82] Where the statement of account filed by defendant was false or insufficient, defendant may be ordered to pay the fees of accountants employed by the master or by plaintiff to examine defendant's books;[83] but this rule does not apply where defendant realized no profits[84] or where there were no irreconcilable differences between the statement of account filed by him and the statement prepared by the accountants employed by plaintiff;[85] and even where applicable, the rule should be applied with caution[86] and the charges allowed should be limited to those which are reasonable[87] and do not include compensation for services of the accountants as witnesses.[88] Individuals who own all the stock of, and control, a corporation defendant may be directed to pay the master's fee.[89]

Costs unnecessarily accumulated will not be allowed.[90]

[§ 657] D. Threats of Suit. Suit may be maintained by a manufacturer to enjoin the owner of a patent from making baseless threats of suit for infringement against the former's customers,[91] but an injunction will not be granted where there is a reasonable doubt as to the propriety of defendant's actions,[92] and where the owner of a patent, in good faith, makes truthful statements concerning his patent and warns and notifies persons against infringement, he does not thereby render himself liable either to an injunction[93] or for damages.[94]

At common law, as applied to charities, such as universities, the patron was the founder, the endower.[43]

In public school statutes, one who is not only a taxpayer but also sends his children to the school.[44] The term applies only to the head of a family, on whom the law primarily places the responsibility of support and education of his minor children, generally the father, and if none, then the mother or guardian, but not both the father and the mother.[45]

Used in reference to a house of ill fame, one who goes there in the character of a purchaser, to be accommodated and entertained in the way of a bawdyhouse.[46]

PATRONAGE.[47] Special countenance or support.[48]

PATRONIZE.[49] To act as a patron[50] toward;[51] to encourage; to extend patronage; to favor; to lend countenance.[52]

PATRONUM FACIUNT DOS, ÆDIFICATIO, FUNDUS.[53]

I. DUTY OF RELIEF IN GENERAL

[§ 1] A. Who Are Paupers[1]—1. In General. While, technically, it is said, the term "pauper" means only a person receiving aid and assistance from the public under a provision made by law for the support and maintenance of the poor,[2] the term is often given a wider signification.[3] It may include a poor person standing in need of immediate relief, and a poor person likely to become chargeable;[4] and, generally, the terms "pauper," "poor," "poor person," "indigent person," "person in distress," etc., in statutes providing for the relief of such persons, are used to describe that class of persons who are so destitute and helpless as to be dependent for their support upon public charity.[5] Where a per-

"In a technical sense the word 'pauper' does not apply to a poor person smitten with a contagious disease, who on account of his sickness receives aid from the county, though under a pauper act." Sweetwater County v. Carbon County, supra [cit La Salle County Comrs. v. Reynolds, 49 Ill. 186].

"The term 'pauper' has a distinct and well-defined meaning in our law. It is used to designate those persons whose support imposes a burden on the public treasury. One may be ever so destitute of estate or ability to earn a livelihood, and yet not be a pauper. He may be cared for by the voluntary action of friends or relatives. The duty to care for him may be by law cast on relatives. He becomes a member of the pauper class only when, the other means of support failing, he becomes a public charge." Weeks v. Mansfield, 84 Conn. 544, 549, 80 A 784.

"The word 'pauper' . . . does not necessarily imply a person who has actually received support from the town, as the word in this chapter is used indiscriminately to designate poor and indigent persons standing in need of relief, and poor persons likely to become chargeable, as well as such poor persons as have actually received support from the town." Walbridge v. Walbridge, supra.

(2) A person who has become temporarily helpless by reason of a personal injury, and has no means of support except his labor, is a pauper during the period of his disability. Blodgett v. Lowell, 33 Vt. 174.

[b] When any temporary support is given to a poor person, it is in all cases a question of fact whether such poor person was, at the time the support was so furnished, a pauper within the meaning of the statute. Holland v. Belgium, 66 Wis. 557, 29 NW 558.

son is in need of relief within the meaning of the statute, the cause of his distress, whether through his own fault or not, is immaterial.[6]

[§ 2] 2. Ability of Self-Support.[7] A person who is unable to provide for and maintain himself is a pauper,[8] at least prima facie,[9] and entitled to relief. And where a family is in want, the members thereof are poor and unable to support themselves, within the meaning of the various statutes, although the head of the family earns enough for their partial support.[10] It has also been held that a husband, although able to support himself, is a pauper if he has a family under his care and protection which he is unable to support,[11] and that a wife becomes a pauper where, although able to support herself, she is prevented from doing so because of her husband's illness, and the necessity of attending him as nurse.[12] But a person who has always been able to support himself is not a pauper within the purview of the various statutes making provision for the relief of that class of persons,[13] although the wages earned by him are barely sufficient for that purpose,[14] and a fortiori he is not a pauper where his earnings are more than enough for his support.[15] Nor is one a pauper, although without ability to support himself, where he has relatives or friends able and willing to care for him.[16] But the fact that a person has once received relief from public authorities does not make him a pauper or poor person after he has become self-supporting.[17] And where, at the time a person, with his family, was quarantined by the board of health, he was supporting the family and was able to continue such support after he was released from quarantine, he cannot be deemed a pauper.[18]

[§ 3] 3. Ability and Willingness of Relatives or Others To Support. As a general rule a person is not a pauper within the meaning of the poor laws if there are relatives or other persons legally liable for his support,[19] and able and willing to support him.[20] Thus a child who has parents[21] or grandparents,[22] or a parent who has children,[23] or a wife who has a husband,[24] legally liable for his or her support and able to furnish the same, is not a pauper. On the other hand a person may be a pauper within the meaning of the poor laws, although there are individuals liable by law for his support,[25] and able and willing to provide such support.[26]

Pauperism of parents. A minor child does not necessarily become a pauper by reason of the mere pauperism of his parents.[27]

Indigent pensioners. A Confederate soldier who, from poverty and age, or infirmity, is unable to provide for himself is within a statute relating to relief of "indigent pensioners," although he has a parent or child able and willing to support him, and he does not come within the statute making provision for paupers.[28]

[§ 4] 4. Ownership or Possession of Property. The general rule is that, so long as a person is possessed of property which can be made available for his support he cannot be considered a "pauper" in the sense that the word is used in the statutes;[29] but if the property which he may own cannot be made available for his immediate wants he is within the meaning of the statutes.[30] And in many cases the rule has been laid down that it is not necessary, in order to entitle a person to relief as a pauper, that he should be altogether destitute of property, but that all that is necessary to entitle him to such relief is to show that he does not possess sufficient property for his maintenance and support.[31]

[§ 5] 5. [a] Rule applied.—(1) The fact that a person owned a horse and cow did not conclusively show that he was not a "poor person" in need of assistance from a town, within the pauper laws. Waitsfield v. Craftsbury, 87 Vt. 406, 89 A 466, AnnCas 1916C 387. (2) Under Gen. St. (1923) § 3157, imposing upon relatives the duty of supporting a poor person, a mother, unable to earn a livelihood, without means other than annual rents of two hundred dollars, and needing more for maintenance, is a "poor person." Howie v. Gangloff, 165 Minn. 346, 206 NW 441.

[b] The ownership of a house of little value, and reasonably necessary for the shelter of the owner's family, will not prevent him from being a pauper and entitled to relief. Fish v. Perkins, 52 Conn. 200; Norridgewock v. Solon, 49 Me. 385; Poplin v. Hawke, 8 N. H. 305. See Wallingford v. Southington, 16 Conn. 431, 435 ("We cannot think, that the law upon this subject is so rigid, that if a poor man owns a miserable hovel, used as a shelter for his family, he must sell it, provided it is of any value whatever, before he can properly call upon the selectmen of a town to assist him in procuring medicine and bread for his sick and famishing children. . . . Such a rule would be harsh and inconvenient").

[c] In England it has been held that an old age pensioner, who is not in receipt of poor relief, is not a person entirely outside the discharge of duties which a parish council owes to the poor. Baird v. Wallace-James, 85 L. J. P. C. 193.

32. Receipt of supplies as preventing acquisition of settlement see infra §§ 100–103.

33. Bucksport v. Cushing, 69 Me. 224; Sheboygan County v. Sheboygan receiving support from a county, town, or municipality is technically a pauper;[34] and where the public authorities furnish necessary aid to a person, with his knowledge, for the support of another whom he is legally liable to support, he is himself a pauper.[35] But this last rule does not apply where relief is provided on the application of a person who owes no legal duty of support to the person receiving such relief.[36] Thus a man is under no legal obligation to support his stepchild[37] and the fact that such child receives aid from a town as a pauper upon the application of the stepfather will not make the latter a pauper.[38] The question whether a person is chargeable to a town as a pauper does not depend merely upon the fact that it has furnished him relief but likewise upon its legal obligation to do so.[39]

[§ 6] 6. Transient Poor Persons. In many jurisdictions the statutes require counties, towns, and municipal corporations to furnish relief to any person temporarily residing therein who is found sick or in distress and in need of immediate assistance, without reference to the ultimate liability of any other county, town, municipality, or individual for such person's support;[40] and this duty will be enforced when, and only when, the facts show a case coming fairly within the terms of the statute.[41] The purpose of these statutes is to provide for the present necessities of any person found to be in

[a] The phrase "supported as a pauper" involves, not only the idea that aid shall have been given by a town, but that the aid shall have been applied to, or received by, the supposed pauper. Sheboygan County v. Sheboygan Falls, 130 Wis. 93, 109 NW 1030.

[b] One living in the family of a pauper aided by a town, who pays his board, whether in money or in services, which enables some member of the family to devote his time to earning money for its support, does not receive aid from the town as a pauper merely because the family use the money furnished by the town to purchase the food which he eats. Sheboygan County v. Sheboygan Falls, 130 Wis. 93, 109 NW 1030.

[c] Families of absent soldiers, in the service of the United States, when standing in need of assistance, do not incur the disabilities of pauperism by receiving supplies from the cities or towns where such soldiers resided at the time of their enlistment. Veazie v. China, 50 Me. 518.

[a] Persons entitled to relief.—(1) A transient pauper, under the Vermont statute, is a person who is suddenly taken sick or is otherwise disabled or confined at any house in any town (New Haven v. Middlebury, 63 Vt. 399, 21 A 608) (2) or is committed to jail (New Haven v. Middlebury, supra; Bristol v. Rutland, 10 Vt. 574; Danville v. Putney, 6 Vt. 512; Manchester v. Rupert, 6 Vt. 291; Pawlet v. Rutland, Brayt. (Vt.) 175) and is in need of relief away from the town in which he resided. (3) As between the person at whose house the disabled person is confined, and the town in which he is confined, the liability of the town does not depend on such person's transiency as distinguished from the permanency of having come to reside, but, as to that, only on his being confined by disability at some house that is not his home. Goodell v. Mt. Holly, 51 Vt. 423. (4) Under Pub. St. § 3670, the town is liable, even though a transient is not left in the hands of the overseer of the poor. Wilbur v. Calais, 90 Vt. 335, 98 A 913. (5) A married man who leaves his place of residence and goes into another town to work, leaving his family at the former place, is a transient person. Bristol v. Rutland, 10 Vt. 574. (6) In Pennsylvania the act of June 25, 1885, imposing on counties liability for support of homeless persons in certain cases, is limited to persons found traveling about from place to place, idle, and apparently homeless, and without means of subsistence. Austin Poor Dist. v. Potter County, 1 Pa. Dist. 637.

[b] That the disability should be caused by the sudden visitation of disease or accident (1) is not necessary (Stone v. Glover, 60 Vt. 651, 15 A 334; Charleston v. Lunenburgh, 23 Vt. 525), (2) but "otherwise disabled" is enough (Stone v. Glover, supra; Charleston v. Lunenburgh, supra).

[c] Persons held not transient paupers.—(1) Vershire v. Hyde Park, 64 Vt. 638, 25 A 431. (2) A married woman who, with her children, comes to reside in a town, and, while seeking recovery for support from another town, comes to want, is not a "transient." Cabot v. St. Johnsbury, 94 Vt. 311, 111 A 454. (3) A pauper who comes into a town, intending and desiring to remain, and stays for months, able to walk about, is not a "transient pauper," for supporting whom an individual furnishing necessaries can recover reimbursement from the town. Macoon v. Berlin, 49 Vt. 13. (4) One who has bought a house and lot in a town, and supports his family there for a time before he becomes indigent, is not a "transient pauper" for whose support such town can recover of the town whence he came. New Haven v. Middlebury, 63 Vt. 399, 21 A 608.

[d] State paupers; period of relief.—Under L. (1878) c 94 § 3, providing that all persons needing relief, and having no settlement in any town in the state, shall be state paupers, and shall, when needing relief, be provided for by the comptroller "for the period of six months after they came into this state," it has been held that the period intended was the first six months after their arrival in the state. Marlborough v. Chatham, 50 Conn. 554.

[e] Funeral expenses.—A statute
